It is easy to understand why smut hunters regard the ACLU as satanic. The ACLU maintains that in order "to guard against the stifling effect of censorship no ban should be placed on allegedly obscene material, even though much material may be intensely disliked by many persons." At worst, the ACLU concedes, only material that constitutes "clear and present danger" of criminal behavior should be banned.

Though CDL cites common sense, the occasional discovery of a cache of smut in a rapist's closet, and the authority of J. Edgar Hoover ("We know that an overwhelmingly large number of sex crimes is associated with pornography"), the actual linking of reading habits and criminal behavior has so far eluded the efforts of science.

CDL insists that it is against censorship. It publishes no list of forbidden books, although it does offer a list of materials judged obscene in federal and state courts. It does not participate in or encourage boycotts, which, in any case, have been declared illegal in various "no prior restraint" court decisions. CDL does, however, advocate the one-man boycott, individual pressure on a store or newsstand in the form of polite comment to the owner that whereas in general his merchandise is of high caliber, some of his books and magazines are disgraceful. This, too, is the line taken in CDL letter-writing campaigns, which in Cincinnati apparently have posted "tens of thousands of letters." CDL letter writers are urged to be polite and complimentary, "never to mention a religious or group affiliation," to mail by first-class registered—these letters "are usually given personal attention"—and to follow up successful action with congratulations.

(Youth CDL, which appeared 200-strong at the convention, with forty Cincinnati high school students presenting skits they had rehearsed in the bus on the way up, devotes much of its time to stuffing envelopes and assembling printed matter for Adult CDL. Youth CDL also writes, telephones and give speeches on its own.)

The sincerity of CDL's noncensorship piety is further compromised by the ease with which its warriors drop gutter fighting to take out after quasi, finally genuine, literary figures. Mention of Ralph Ginsburg, whose case has reached the Supreme Court, stirred the delegates to titter as if they knew a dirty man when they heard his name. ("We've got to be in on this case [with an amicus curiae brief]" Keating told me, "because what happens here will be used as a blanket everywhere else.") That Maurice Girodias of the Olympia Press should come to the United States when France, "known for its sex-mindedness," would not have him, was interpreted for the convention as a sure sign of our moral decay. Hugh Hefner, who two years ago lashed out at CDL in "The Playboy Philosophy," was called "our most infamous pornographer" by the Rev. Francis X. Lawlor of Santa Rita High School in Chicago and spiritual leader for the Illinois Knights of Columbus Moral Decency campaign. Father Lawlor also told the convention that he didn't think our country's librarians knew they had been "betrayed and misrepresented" by the Intellectual Freedom Committee of the American Library Association, which had filed an amicus curiae brief before the Supreme Court in defense of Tropic of Cancer. Tropic was digested for the convention by O. K. Armstrong as "a young man's adventures with numerous prostitutes in Paris."

The single grain of wit among the chaff was Cleveland Amory. Hailed as a courageous man for daring to go against the Eastern Literary Establishment, Amory warned the convention "not to lose your sense of balance," and suggested that the best weapon against smut was ridicule. Amory read several passages from dirty books; the audience was not amused.

The Knights of Columbus, whom Keating joined two days before the convention, have contributed $15,000 to CDL and have persuaded the National Fraternal Council, ninety-eight societies with 10 million members, to launch an anti-pornography campaign. Reader's Digest has kicked in $2,000, Newsweek $100. And the convention itself was addressed by a Houst rabbi, a Baptist senior deacon, t Knights' Supreme Knight, a Pen sylvania Supreme Court justice, California Assemblyman, the Ne York City Schools Superintende plus doctors, lawyers, Father La lor, Fulton Oursler, Jr., and Clev land Amory. Except for Amor these men spoke at length, wi great fervor and the rhetoric of se appointed virtue. The hot air alo was enough to turn me against CD

And there is something more. is that "any time you try to sell cause to the public," as Keating co fessed to me, "you attract all so of people you'd rather not have an where near you." Such as bo burners, censors, zealots and prud Such as the people who might p CDL's "Stamp Out Smut" bump stickers next to "Support Your L cal Police." Such as the Digest writ for whom Tropic of Cancer is odyssey-cum-prostitutes. Such as t California Assemblyman who wa ed to remove the Dictionary American Slang from high scho libraries. Such as the Supre Knight who considers pornograp "as potentially pernicious as bom from Peking, rockets from Mosco or missiles from Havana." Such James J. Clancy, CDL legal couns and sole paid staffer, who seem reluctant to admit to me that he ceived $20,000 a year, but who d not shrink from urging the recall New York's Judge J. Irwin Shapi who ruled in 1963 that "novels a stories of no literary merit have place in our society. There are th who, because of lack of educatio the meanness of their social exi ence, or mental insufficiency, ca not cope with anything better."

Perhaps a more sophisticated titude toward obscenity would ha to follow George Steiner's argume against High Pornography in t October Encounter. Besides the " escapable monotony" of the n erotica, Steiner resents its invasi of our privacy, its usurpation of o imaginings. In fine, says Stein "these books leave a man less fr less himself than they found hi they leave the language poorer, le endowed with a capacity for fre discrimination and excitement."

In any case, the defense of fr dom of speech as an absolute ne seemed as necessary to me, as wh I listened to CDL proclaiming th for every freedom there is c responding responsibility.

'I Come From Julius'

VITATION TO AN INQUEST. By Walter and Miriam Schneir. Double-day & Company. 480 pp. $5.95.

Fred J. Cook

June 19, 1953, Ethel and Julius senberg were sent to the electric air in Sing Sing as "atom-bomb ies," though doubts and suspicions a miscarriage of justice troubled any. By some of the best detective rk in modern journalism, Walter d Mirian Schneir advance these ubts to a point of proof which can- t be ignored. They have produced book which is also a vital social cument, one that should be not just "Invitation to an Inquest" in the senberg case, but into the whole itch-hunt era, and, most importantly, to the role played by J. Edgar Hoo- r and his virtually sacrosanct Bu- au of Investigation in this and her celebrated cases of that era.

To understand the significance of hat the Schneirs have done, it is cessary to sketch the bare bones the Rosenberg tragedy. Julius and hel Rosenberg went to the electric air on the judicial premise that ey had committed "the crime of the ntury" and "a crime worse than urder" by transmitting atom-bomb crets to Russia. Morton Sobell, who as convicted with them on the most nuous evidence, still remains in ison. The Rosenberg-Sobell case, as has come to be called, developed t of the confession that Klaus Fuchs ade to English authorities. Fuchs, ho had worked on the atom-bomb oject, recalled that he had funneled formation to the Russians through courier whose identity he did not ow and whom he could describe ly vaguely.

With only this to go on, J. Edgar oover and the FBI determined to eir own satisfaction that Fuchs's urier had been Harry Gold, a Phila- lphia chemist, originally mentioned Elizabeth Bentley's tales of es- ionage. With Gold in hand, the FBI veloped its own bigger and better tom spy case. As polished and re- rbished and ultimately produced in court under the guidance of the Right-gaited tandem of Irving Saypol and Roy Cohn, it went like this:

Gold testified that he had gone to Santa Fe to pick up information from Fuchs in early June, 1945. On his return trip, he stopped off in Albuquerque, where he contacted David and Ruth Greenglass. David Greenglass was in the army, working as a machinist on the atom-bomb project at Los Alamos. He was the brother-in-law of Julius Rosenberg and, according to his subsequent testimony, Rosenberg had recruited him to spy for Russia. Greenglass later testified that he first gave Julius some secret details of the atom-bomb project while in New York on furlough on January 1, 1945. Ethel Rosenberg, the Greenglasses were to testify, retyped this material for transmission to the Russians, and Rosenberg made arrangements with Greenglass at this time for the subsequent pickup of information at Albuquerque. According to both Greenglass and his wife, Rosenberg had torn a Jello box top (or box side, the versions slightly differ) in an irregular pattern and had said that the courier who would come for information would present the matching half. Gold testified that he had been given the matching piece of box top by Anatoli A. Yakovlev, the Russian Vice Consul in New York. As may be seen, the entire atom-spy case hinged upon these dovetailing tales of Gold and Greenglass: for, though Gold had had no direct contact with Rosenberg, the details to which he testified inevitably implicated Rosenberg. One of the most dramatic of these details was Gold's account of the manner in which he supposedly appeared out of the blue at the Greenglasses' door in Albuquerque, flashing his half of the Jello-box talisman, and introducing himself with the magic words, "I come from Julius."

Greenglass produced sketches of the lens mold of the atomic bomb, and Gold handed Greenglass an envelope containing $500. Returning to New York, Gold transmitted the lens-mold sketches to Yakovlev; and, at the trial, Gold testified that the Russian subsequently told him "the information I had given him some two weeks previous had been sent immediately to the Soviet Union. He said the information which I had received from Greenglass was extremely excellent and very valuable." This was the basis for the grotesque magnification of the Rosenberg case into "the crime of the century."

To support this entire fabric of the dovetailing stories of Greenglass and Gold, there were just two bits of documentary evidence—a June 3, 1945 hotel registration card and a bank record showing that Ruth Greenglass had opened an account with a $400 deposit the day after Harry Gold left Albuquerque. The hotel registration was basic; for, if the Hotel Hilton registration for Gold was legitimate, it would establish that he had been in Albuquerque at the time he testified he was, and this, tied up with the immediately following bank deposit, would tend to support the entire account of espionage.

From the first, there were implausibilities that challenged belief, but they never had a chance to register with the jury because Emanuel Bloch, the Rosenbergs' attorney, incredibly chose not to challenge a single item of the Gold story. Yet Gold, who had admitted in a previous trial that he had habitually told so many lies over a period of years that it was a wonder "smoke didn't come out of my ears," was a witness who was a sitting duck for a stiff cross-examination, and his account of his adventure in Albuquerque was loaded with inconsistencies. As Gold told it, he arrived in Albuquerque on a Saturday night; he went to see the Greenglasses; he found they were out for the evening, but would be home Sunday. He then found himself space for the night in the hallway of a rooming house, and the next morning, Sunday, he registered at the Hilton just for the day. He never intended to stay overnight at the Hilton because he had to get back to New York fast to keep a prearranged June 6 date with Yakovlev. Then why did he register for a hotel room he wouldn't need?

This question led John Wexley in The Judgment of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg to challenge the genuineness of the hotel card and to theorize that it could have served only one purpose—the prosecution's courtroom purpose of establishing that Gold had indeed been in Albuquerque when he said he had. In his investigation, Wexley discovered that there had been a second Hilton Hotel registration card that was never produced at the trial. This showed that Gold had registered at the Hilton on a subsequent trip on September 19, 1945. Wexley was puzzled because it was clear the September trip could have had no connection with Greenglass, who was on furlough in New York at the time. Therefore, why would Gold go to Albuquerque in September when the contact whom he would presumably have gone to meet was in New York? On the basis of this reasoning, Wexley concluded that both hotel cards must be forgeries, and he theorized that the Hotel Hilton had been chosen for the deed because it was the only one in the area that kept hotel registration cards on file more than three years—and so the only hotel that could have had the needed documentation when the FBI came searching in 1950.

The Schneirs have carried Wexley's research several leagues onward. They discovered that the June card, though dated the 3rd on its face, had been time-stamped on the back: "June 4, 12:36 P.M." All hotel officials agreed that the time stamp would be the accurate record. But by June 4 Gold was on his way back to New York to meet Yakovlev, and Greenglass had returned early in the morning to his army chores. What this time stamp said, in effect, was that the elaborately constructed courtroom case couldn't have happened as Gold and Greenglass had testified it happened. But the Schneirs' discoveries were only beginning.

Their interest was further aroused when they learned that FBI agents had spent several days in the hotel attic, sorting through back records. Under the hotel's filing system, it should have required only a matter of minutes to locate the registration cards of Harry Gold. Why this protracted search? (The Schneirs theorize it may have been necessary to determine what rooms were available on June 3, who was on desk duty, etc.) More vital was the Schneirs' discovery that both the June 3 and September 19 registrations had been initialed by the same desk clerk—A.K. At this point, suspicion became virtually confirmed. One does not need to be a handwriting expert to come to the almost instant conclusion that there was remarkably little resemblance between the neat, clear penmanship on the September 19 card and the harsher, upward-slanting lines (they look as if they had been traced by a left-handed writer) on the June 3 registration.

At this point, the Schneirs decided to trace A.K. She turned out to be Mrs. Anna Kinderknecht Hockinson, now living in Florida. Mrs. Hockinson furnished the researchers with examples of her handwriting, and these, together with photostats of the registration cards, were turned over to Mrs. Elizabeth McCarthy, an attorney and a document expert for the Boston police and the Massachusetts State Police. Mrs. McCarthy concluded that Harry Gold had in all probability signed both cards, but she found that the June 3 card bore evidences of being a forged document. Its typing and spacing varied in minute but important details from that on the September 19 card, and the desk clerk's writing did not appear to be that of Mrs. Hockinson.

Mrs. McCarthy could give only a qualified opinion since she was working from photostats. This handicap was the result of one of the series of fantastic blunders, if that is what they were, by which Bloch helped the prosecution insure the conviction of his clients. Irving Saypol had waited until Gold was off the stand, dismissed without a single question in cross-examination, before he gingerly informed the court and the defense that he had a photostat of Gold's June 3 Hotel Hilton registration. The original, he said, was being flown from Albuquerque, and he had a witness who would testify to it; but it might simplify things all around if Bloch would just stipulate that this was the card. Ever obliging, Bloch stipulated—and thus relieved the government of the necessity of proving anything about this vital bit of documentation. As a result, no document examiner can now study the original to compare its composition and its ink with other cards of the June period in the Hilton Hotel files.*

In this context, another of the Schneirs' discoveries seems important. It is an invariable FBI practice, wh documentary evidence of this natu is discovered, for the FBI agents u earthing it to initial it and appe the case number. The back of t September 19 card contained the d it was unearthed in the Hilton fil May 25, 1950, the initials of th FBI agents and the FBI code des nation, "65-6." The back of the Ju 3 card was blank except for the i tials of the hotel manager.

If the Schneirs' researches h ended here, their work would ha been infinitely significant and va able, though it would have stopp short of the final full measure proof. But the Schneirs did not st They added the final and vital gredient. They unearthed the det of the story as Harry Gold origin told it before it was refined and alt ed for its courtroom presentation.

Parenthetically, it should be no that the record is clear and unde able concerning the veracity of Ha Gold: he was a pathological liar. the Brothman-Moskowitz trial t preceded the Rosenberg case, he been exposed as such an arrant f ricator that he admitted having galed his fellow workers for ye with a never-ending fantasy abou wife he didn't have, children he did have, and domestic discords problems that were entirely ima nary. In 1955, four years after Rosenberg-Sobell trial, Gold took stand in Dayton, Ohio, as the p cipal witness against one Benja Smilg. The defense in this case handled by William F. Hopkins did not, as Bloch did, let Gold esc cross-examination and praise him his candor.

Hopkins, by making use of the Br man-Moskowitz record that had b equally available to Bloch, expo Gold for what he was and got him admit that, in the family soap op he had concocted, he had lied lied "for a period of sixteen ye not alone six." Then Hopkins q tioned Gold about his appearance fore a federal grand jury in New Y in 1947 and drew from him the mission that he had lied under o about far more important matt This is the sequence:

> HOPKINS: Before that gra jury, the question came up of man named Golos. . . .
> GOLD: Yes, Jacob Golos.
> HOPKINS: Before that you did know him?
> GOLD: I didn't know him bef that.

*In a letter to William Kunstler, dated Sept. 10, 1965, J. Edgar Hoover wrote (with reference to the original registration cards of the Hilton Hotel, Albuquerque, for June 3 and Sept. 19, 1945, in the name of Harry Gold) that "due to passage of time these cards are no longer available." The Editors

HOPKINS: Never met him?

GOLD: Never met him.

HOPKINS: Before that grand jury you faced those ladies and gentlemen, under oath, the same as you are facing these folks, and you concocted imaginary telephone conversations, even giving it word for word of what he said to you and what you said to him; is that true?

GOLD: That is true.

HOPKINS: And you didn't even know the man?

GOLD: I didn't even know the man.

HOPKINS: Never had had a telephone call?

GOLD: Never had a telephone call.

HOPKINS: And you were under oath?

GOLD: And I was under oath, yes, sir.

In view of such a background, it ecomes of the utmost importance to scertain what tales Gold told before ny lengthy conference with FBI gents. This is the crux of the Rosenerg case, as it has been the crux f other cases throughout the witchunt era. Whittaker Chambers, the ccuser of Alger Hiss, was an aditted perjurer. Elizabeth Bentley, ne nemesis of William Remington, hanged her testimony like a weather ane whirling in a williwaw, in order o meet the changing needs of the rosecution. In all these cases, imortant aspects of step-by-step changes f testimony are hidden in closely uarded secret files of the FBI, under he pretense that the very security of he nation depends upon the presrvation of such secrecy. In this erspective, perhaps one of the greatst contributions the Schneirs have nade lies in the fact that they found . way to tear aside the veil; they have roduced Harry Gold's pristine recolections—and by contrasting this tesimony with that which was presented n court, they make a strong showng for a rigged case.

The Schneirs credit Robert Moris and the Senate Internal Security ommittee with an unconscious assist n this endeavor. In 1956 the Senate ommittee brought Harry Gold back o the stand for some more revelaions; in publishing his testimony, it ppended two statements that he had vritten for his attorney, John D. M. Iamilton, one-time chairman of the lepublican National Committee. Each tatement had been written by Gold nonths before the Rosenberg-Sobell rial. In one of these statements, Gold xplicitly contradicted "the crime of the century" trial testimony he was soon to give. "Yakovlev . . . told me that the information received (from Greenglass) was of no value," he wrote. (Italics added.)

The other statement indicated that Harry Gold's mind was being changed about substantive facts, not as he testified at the trial by any direct word he received from Russia, but by what he was being told while in custody. "Earlier, I have said that I believed the information to have been unimportant," he wrote, "but I have since learned that it was highly valuable. . . . Greenglass was a machinist and I have been told that he worked on a very important phase of the bomb assembly." (Italics added.)

Gold further disclosed that he couldn't even remember anything about the rendezvous with Greenglass when the FBI first began questioning him. He said he told agents "the full story about my relationship with Klaus Fuchs in every detail . . . the David Greenglass incident I had actually completely forgotten about . . . until some time after my arrest, all memory of this incident had fled from me. . . . And I had forgotten the man's name completely." (Italics added.)

How, if Gold had "completely forgotten" the man's name, did he later come to identify David Greenglass so emphatically? He explained—and this is perhaps one of the most incredible parts of the story—that this is what was done:

> A list of some twenty names was selected; first we eliminated the least likely ten; then we cut the list further; finally a group of the three most likely was chosen, and lo, Greenglass' name was at the top. For the wife's name we did likewise and again "Ruth" headed the list.

The peephole that Robert Morris and the Senate Internal Security Committee had unwittingly opened into the maze of the Rosenberg-Sobell case encouraged the Schneirs to press their researches further. They learned that John D. M. Hamilton had recorded on disks lengthy conversations in which Gold presumably had told his attorney the full truth shortly after his arrest and before the arrest of Greenglass and the building of the atom-spy case. So the Schneirs went to Philadelphia and saw Hamilton. The attorney told them they would have to get Harry Gold's consent to gain access to the material in his

In Autumn

The extinct animals are still looking for home
Their eyes full of cotton

Now they will Never arrive

The stars are like that

Moving on without memory
Without having been near turning elsewhere climbing Nothing the wall

The hours their shadows

The lights are going on in the leaves nothing to do with evening

Those are cities
Where I had hoped to live

After the Solstice

Under the east cliff the spring flows into the snow

The bird tracks end like calendars

At noon white hair
Is caught in the thorns of the abandoned vineyard
Here the sky passed

The old are buried all down the slope Except the wrists and the ancient Message We are with no one

At midnight we raise their wine to tomorrow

Crows on the North Slope

When the Gentle were dead these inherited their coats
Now they gather in late autumn and quarrel over the air Demanding something for their shadows that are naked
And silent and learning

The Cold Before the Moonrise

It is too simple to turn to the sound Of frost stirring among its Stars like an animal asleep
In the winter night
And say I was born far from home
If there is a place where this is the language may
It be my country

New Moon in November

I have been watching crows and now it is dark
Together they led night into the creaking oaks
Under them I hear the dry leaves walking

That blind man
Gathering their feathers before winter
By the dim road that the wind will take

And the cold

December Among the Vanished

The old snow gets up and moves taking its Birds with it

The beasts hide in the knitted walls
From the winter that lipless man
Hinges echo but nothing opens

A silence before this one
Has left its broken huts facing the pastures
Through their stone roofs the snow
And the darkness walk down

In one of them I sit with a dead shepherd
And watch his lambs

s. The Schneirs wrote to Gold, d much to their surprise, Gold au-rized Hamilton to give them full ess to everything. The result was t the Schneirs got the opportunity play back the Harry Gold disks d to hear Gold telling his attorney his own words just what had hap-ned.

The key recording was one that ld made for Hamilton on June 14, 50, exactly one day before the FBI ved in on David Greenglass and wife. At this point, Gold had been estioned for 102 hours by FBI ents: his blank mind had been re-shed about his trip to Albuquerque. t it is highly significant that after 2 hours of questioning and col-oration with the FBI—at this point dway between the original nothing-ss and the final dramatic story told the witness stand—the vital de-ls of that espionage trip as Gold alled them bore virtually no re-nblance to the court-presented case.

On June 14, 1950, Gold told his at-ney that on his 1945 trip to Albu-erque he had stayed in a rooming use overnight on Saturday, and on ving the rooming house Sunday rning, he had "checked my bags the railroad station." He made no ference to any stay at the Hotel lton on June 3, 1945, and the ecific detail that he had checked bags at the railroad station seems clinch the argument that he never nt near the Hilton — and that the ne 3 registration card is a forgery.

In his trial testimony, Gold was claim that Yakovlev had given him a p of paper with the name "Green-ss" on it and an address on "High reet." He was to testify: "I intro-ced myself to Greenglass as Dave m Pittsburgh. . . . Greenglass in-duced me to his wife Ruth. Mrs. eenglass said it was a coincidence at my first name and the first me of her husband were the same." l of this petty and seemingly au-entic detail, related so positively by ld at the trial, was absolutely miss-g from his recollection on June 14, 50, after 102 hours of collaboration th the FBI. In this recording, he ver mentioned Greenglass by name aybe the grab-bag name game dn't been played yet), but kept ferring to him as "the GI" and "his fe." He said specifically: "I don't member the name of the street. . . ." d as for that charming bit about e matching names of Dave, it never ppened. Gold told his attorney that he had introduced himself to "the GI" by "the name of Mr. Frank, possibly Raymond Frank, possibly Frank (indistinct)."

Once more, in this recorded interview, Gold indicated that whatever information he may have brought back from Albuquerque was inconsequential. He told Hamilton that he "turned the information over to John (Yakovlev); John never mentioned anything about it." At another point in the recorded interview, Gold said he had later reminded Yakovlev that "the GI" was going to be home in New York on furlough. Perhaps they should contact him? But Yakovlev, he said, told him "we could forget all about him . . . apparently the information received had not been of very much consequence at all and that they believed the risk attendant upon seeing him did not make any such effort worth while."

At the trial, Gold was to testify that Yakovlev had written out for him, along with the Greenglasses' name and address, the recognition code: "I come from Julius." He testified that he introduced himself with these damning words—the words that virtually put the Rosenbergs in the electric chair. He testified that he had presented his matching piece of the Jello box—a talisman that had been given to him by Yakovlev and that, if it ever existed, would establish the conspiracy because Yakovlev could have received it only from Rosenberg. Yet none of this vital evidence appears in Harry Gold's June 14 recital to Hamilton after 102 hours of collaboration with the FBI. Indeed, at one point, Hamilton himself raised the question about how Gold had been expected to identify himself to "the GI."

> HAMILTON: I want to interpolate something at this point. Didn't you have some recognition signal as between the two of you?
> GOLD: Yes, we did, and while this is not the exact recognition sign I believe that it involved the name of a man and was something on the order of Bob sent me or Benny sent me or John sent me or something like that.

Not yet born, evidently, was the dramatic detail of the Jello box top; not yet born those words that were to condemn Rosenberg and his wife, "I come from Julius."

But how, one may ask, was David Greenglass brought to testify against his sister and to send her to the electric chair if there was no truth to the case? The answer plumbs abysmal depths of the human mind. A confidential memo in the files of the Greenglasses' attorney, O. John Rogge, shows that Ruth Greenglass stated her husband had a "tendency to hysteria." She told her attorneys, according to the memo, that she had known him since she was 10 years old and he "would say things were so even when they were not." It is admitted that Greenglass had stolen a piece of uranium from Los Alamos, and there are suggestions in the record that he may have been stealing government property and hocking it in the black market, an activity that might explain, not just the $400 bank deposit on June 4, 1945, but deposits in other accounts that the Greenglasses maintained in other banks in Albuquerque. It is clear, too, from the memos in the Rogge files that one of the first things that suggested itself to Greenglass and his wife, when the FBI came questioning, was full cooperation. The circumstances suggest that Greenglass was a man in trouble, and a man in need of a deal.

Benjamin Pollack subsequently interviewed Greenglass in Lewisburg Penitentiary while preparing a report on the case for Attorney General Herbert Brownell. The report has been classified as a secret document, but its tenor may be gleaned from Pollacks' frank comments to the Schneirs when they interviewed him. Pollack apparently experienced an almost instant revulsion when Greenglass greeted him with the boast, "I'm the smartest man you ever met." The Justice Department attorney told the Schneirs frankly that Greenglass impressed him as a man who had "no conscience at all," and he added: "If I were a judge, I wouldn't take his testimony too seriously." Significantly, Greenglass complained to Pollack about the "raw deal" he had received and disclosed that he was "the most shocked man in the world" when, after testifying for the government against his own sister and her husband, he failed to get a suspended sentence.

The ugly possibility of judicial murder, so strongly advanced by the Schneirs' work on the Rosenberg case, is especially horrible because it reached a climax in the electric chair in Sing Sing. The question inevitably arises: Why? Why should this have been? Why would the agencies of government build a fraudulent case against innocent persons?

The motivation can be understood, I think, only in the context of the times. The groundwork for the Rosenberg case was laid in those pre-election months of 1948 in which the Alger Hiss and William Remington cases were pumped into scare headlines by Congressional witch hunters. The purpose was to splatter the New Deal, the Fair Deal and all liberalism with the Communist tar brush. That the Russians had stolen our atomic "secrets" with the help of pro-Communist American traitors became a sacred tenet of the House Un-American Activities Committee, and this was reflected and reiterated in daily newspaper headlines.

As the Schneirs make clear in earlier sections of their well-documented book, we possessed no secret. The theory of the release of the power of the atom was known to scientists of every nation. Once the Hiroshima bomb was exploded, we revealed our only real secret—the fact that theory could be made to work. It was only a question of time (and relatively short time at that) before others would duplicate our feat. Our scientists appreciated this reality and tried to make their voices heard, but they were drowned out by the raucous cry of the witch hunt.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE. Edited by Leon Friedman. Foreward by Mark DeWolfe Howe. Pantheon Books. 306 pp. $5.95.

George Feifer

If you are born black in the deep South, you are taught to stay down or get hurt. That's life and that's the law. Each shapes and is shaped by the other toward an overriding goal: white supremacy. Southern Justice examines the role of Southern courts in this process, particularly as they operate to destroy civil rights. It is a collection of seventeen short essays by nineteen lawyers who have worked in the South. We are given descriptions of special anti-civil rights legislation passed by Southern states (there is a recent Mississippi statute providing criminal sanctions for the birth of a second illegitimate child!); detailed narratives of illuminating cases tried in lower Southern courts by contributors to the book; analyses of Southern court systems, trial and appeal, state and federal, in an attempt to devise the best among unsatisfactory methods of protecting Negroes and helping their struggle for equal rights; and some general statements about the federal government's responsibility — and its reluctance to shoulder it—in protecting the rig iously unconstitutional "temporary" order by an Alabama state circuit court.) Besides, even when civil rights matters do come before lower federal courts in the South, Negroes are often treated shabbily; for the federal courts too in the deep South are staffed almost entirely by Southern white men.

This is not to say that the federal courts have failed to help the "Negro revolution." Many federal judges, acting on their consciences, have spoken out courageously to give the written law some meaning; and other judges, acting on the knowledge that in the federal judicial system legitimate grievances may sooner or later be heard, have kept their own segregationist passions somewhat in check. Honest work by a handful of federal judges is changing too little too slowly. (A decade after the Supreme Court decision in Brown, to take the most obvious example, less than 1 per cent of Negro pupils in the eleven states that comprised the Confederacy are attending integrated schools.) If there is a consensus among the contributors to Southern Justice, it is that the federal government must do more, very, very much more, to end the massive violation of federal law that is tolerated and encouraged in the deep South.

Recommendations for increased federal protection within and without the court system are made, some of them novel, most of them well known. But as several commentators point out, there has been no lack of recommendations — and no lack of federal authority and power to implement them. What is lacking, simply, is will. The value of this book is its demonstration that little, really, has changed in the South and its raising again the great question of why the federal government does not use its powers to bring about the change that the President professes to desire. There is a "continuous and total violation of the constitutional rights of every Negro citizen" in several of our states. This we tolerate because we are willing to, not because we must.

I cannot end without mentioning my own reaction to these articles. Why is it, I wondered, that they affected me so mildly? They are full of descriptions of outrageous miscarriages of justice, full of details about the frustrating, appalling, gruesome experiences of all who are not white supremacists in Southern courts. That the law is used to support and enshrine injustice is, as a federal judge said ninety years ago, a greater stain on our civilization than any crimes with which the law is meant to deal. Yet the violations of civil and human rights described here did not shock me; what shocked me was my calm.

It was a calm bred, I am afraid, by a sense of familiarity. After all, we have all known for some time that Southern courts behave something like this. The details of how Southern jurists pervert the law are fascinating in the way that the details of the Moscow trials are fascinating. But there is nothing new, nothing remarkable about the pattern of evil in Southern courts. We have all known, at the very least from a scanning of headlines, what happens when Southern men are tried in Southern courts for the murder of a Medgar Evers, a Viola Liuzzo and a Jonathan Daniels. Nothing in this book is more shocking than those trials, conducted with full national publicity, and in full keeping with the Southern way of life. I am afraid that what I read in Southern Justice seemed normal. Last year's outrages, broadcast and headlined and photographed daily, become this year's commonplaces. When one has supped full of horrors, he loses his power to be stunned—which is the greatest horror.

perspective, that I am beginning to grasp again what it means to a society and its people when the law is used not to protect those suffering from injustice, but to wound them still more. And I am beginning to feel an antipathy again to those responsible for perpetuating this grotesque system, from President Kennedy, some of whose appointments to federal district courts in the deep South were inexcusably bad, to the justice of the peace in Oktibbeha County, Miss., who held court in his greasy gas station. The defendant was an 18-year-old Negro civil rights worker who was forced off the road by a white truck driver—and prosecuted for reckless driving on the latter's recommendation. "These boys here," said His Honor to the defendant's lawyer, pointing to the six white toughs who composed the jury, "would sure admire to play a game with your boy. We call it Dropkick the Nigger."

That Man, Those Years

WAGING PEACE: The White House Years, 1956-1961. By Dwight D. Eisenhower. Doubleday & Company. 741 pp. $6.95.

Paul Jacobs

Everything in Waging Peace can be completely anticipated, and yet it is unbelievable. It is not merely that the President writes woodenly, nor that he is writing about a wooden period of administration. (After all, he was a general, not an essayist, before his election.) But what is so startling about this book is that it is such a clear expression of Eisenhower's view of the country and the Presidency, a view which so clearly matches one very important strain in American life. In that sense, the book is a mirror of the attitudes held by a majority of the voters in 1952, again in 1956, and by a huge minority in 1960, when Nixon lost to Kennedy by only 113,000 votes.

Take the clichés which dot the book: describing a visit to England in 1959, President Eisenhower writes, "Finally we reached the Embassy residence and settled down for a short but pleasant evening with Ambassador Whitney and his charming wife, Betsey." On the next page, he says, "We went to pay a visit to the Queen Mother, that gracious lady, who lived in a modest dwelling not far from the castle," and ends, on the same page, with: "At the afternoon picnic by the lake, the Queen acted as hostess and simple housewife, gracefully cooking the 'dropped scones' over a charcoal burner. . . ." Later, he describes a series of "satisfying and reassuring talks" with Chiang and his "charming wife." Indeed, throughout the book, all women are charming, at the very least.

But such writing, painful as it is to read, would hardly be important if it did not reflect the ugly truth: during all the years of the Eisenhower administrations, our policies, domestic and foreign, were seen by the President as merely the extensions of moral clichés. From a reading of Waging Peace, there seems to be no doubt that Eisenhower really believed in these clichés, and was bewildered, genuinely, when they did not operate effectively as a guide to policy. Unlike Johnson, who is overtly cynical about politics, and Kennedy, who masked his understanding of the political process with an elegant style, Eisenhower is the prototype of the

AGAIN, THE FORD MILLENNIUM

The $85 million program in support of American orchestras announced last month by the Ford Foundation is perhaps the most extreme instance of pure foundationism ever perpetrated on our aching national culture. For of all foundation programs in either the arts or the sciences of which I am aware, this one is most blatantly addressed to the maintenance of a certain level of activity without the least concern for the level of cultivation or responsibility on which it takes place. Given Ford's catastrophic experiences in some of its previous arts programs, notably in opera, where the various objectives, conditions and limitations that were enunciated resulted mainly in artistic fiasco, public embarrassment and undying professional resentment, one can understand the a tions of a program of neuter ological and critical content, w would nevertheless permit the gorgement of a huge chunk of money for an apparently rat purpose, and allow the soundin monumental verbal fanfares
". . . historically . . . the greates of philanthropy in the arts by a s national agency."

An adequate description of th tire program is shockingly easy sentially, Ford has surveyed the dition of American symphony chestras and found it exceller all respects except financial. It fore intends to release $21 m outright and $64 million on a m ing basis to orchestras in two gories—"major" and "metropol

sed entirely on budgetary measure- nt — for application toward ex- nses and endowments. In the long nouncements released by the foun- tion, there is not a single men- n of a projected responsibility or ntent for future orchestral activity, ly of its desired proliferation and curity. Indeed, the Ford directors ve become so principle-shy that ey carefully avoid even any asser- n that the activity in any way ac- ally justifies the support being of- red, or that musical culture as a hole has any importance — orna- ental or otherwise — in American tional life, beyond such bold decla- tions as Mr. Henry T. Heald's that . . a wealthy nation cannot neglect e cultural pursuits that are a part human fulfillment along with ma- ial well-being."

Much more significantly, the ob- ous problems that are in fact de- roying the orchestra as a cultural source in America are not only phorically overlooked in the Ford erature, but in many areas actual- belied. Thus, no consideration hatever is given to the scope or evance of programing, to the des- rate problem of the development d employment of young American nductors, or to the completely achronistic relation of available or- estral resources and contexts to the ntemporary development of the usical art. The entire affair, in fact, akes one wonder to whom, perhaps their desperate desire to avoid still ore friction, the Foundation's lead- s turned for professional advice on e cultural role, responsibilities and eds of American orchestras.

Regardless of the identities of ese advisers, however, the degree unreality in the premises they pro- ded for the Ford Foundation's salva- on of American orchestral activity quite extraordinary. Readers of this lumn, at least, may be genuinely rprised to learn that "American mphony orchestras . . . are usually e artistic leaders in their commu- ty" [sic]—when even our most com- acent journalists have occasionally ted a certain implicit stagnation in e almost universal prevalence of e notorious fifty-piece orchestral pertory. But I found it even more rprising that "any player in a ajor symphony has had to spend least as much time, money, and fort on his education as a teacher. . . Fortunately, most symphony usicians love music and love playing in an orchestra even though many endure penalties due to their meager salaries. As a genuine professional, the orchestra player is willing to do his best under less than ideal conditions of salary, rehearsal time, or acoustics, but he wants the opportunity to show himself and his orchestra at their best. . . ."

No one who has attended even one orchestra rehearsal—especially of one of our "major" ensembles—where the nature of this "genuine professionalism" is most evident, could be unaware that one of the most serious threats to contemporary orchestral survival is precisely the shocking inadequacies in the musical and instrumental education, professional morale and general cultivation of most orchestral musicians. And not only are they thus poorly equipped to fulfill any sort of responsible cultural role but (even if the widespread legend of their total hostility to all music is somewhat exaggerated) their resistance to any music or any approach that challenges the simplistic routines that define their jealously guarded "professional" domain certainly contributes to the absence of any significant production of new orchestral compositions in America. Apparently, the Ford Foundation sees no reason not to approve and reward such typically "professional" behavior as that of the members of the New York Philharmonic during last summer's French-American Festival in greeting one of our most serious and accomplished young composers whose new work they were rehearsing with a chorus of boos and hisses. And lest this be taken with complacency in satisfaction of anyone's anti-composer inclinations, it should be noted that the richest folklore among orchestral good fellows are the anti-intellectual conductor-hating anecdotes of the "You talk-a too much, Klemp'" variety. Naturally, there are players who practice their instruments despite long years of suffering while playing side by side with their incompetent colleagues, and who have remained aloof from and ashamed of the indifference surrounding them. But to them, especially, Ford's irresponsible endorsement of the status quo can seem only a final repudiation of whatever faint hope remained for restoration of musical dignity and value to their professional lives.

Similarly, the principles on which the Ford Foundation intends to evaluate the relative merits of orchestral institutions are surely unique in the history of cultural normatives. One reads that "The American symphony orchestra is surprisingly pre-eminent in terms of age, numbers of concerts, and ubiquity. . . . The Vienna Philharmonic gives twenty-three concerts in a year. The London Symphony performed sixty-six concerts in 1963-64. In the same year, the Boston Symphony gave 121 concerts; the Philadelphia 159; the New York Philharmonic 183. . . . Great ingenuity and energy are being shown by managers in developing new activities and audiences. The New York Philharmonic has not only added pops concerts but last summer free concerts in the city parks. . . . The Carnegie Hall program of bringing American orchestras to New York has pleased New York critics by the quality of the performances. The reviews which orchestras from Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Houston, Dallas and Detroit have received have shown once again that these orchestras measure up to high professional criteria. . . . The eligibility of each . . . orchestra and the amount each receives will reflect the level of its operations, its artistic and managerial stability, the breadth of its musical program, and its capacity to raise matching funds." Despite a first impulse to dismiss such utterances as self-ridiculing and therefore harmless, they acquire a frightening dimension when one considers that they have provided the entire ideational basis for "the greatest act of philanthropy in the arts, etc." For certainly the positive destructiveness of massive misspending is as real as its purely negative toll in crucial opportunities forever missed.

Thus one must regard with great seriousness the absence in the quoted passages or elsewhere in the release of any suggestion that orchestral growth might best be encouraged by explicitly liberating orchestras from their invariable crowd- and critic-pleasing responsibilities. Real damage is done, too, by Ford's evident failure to recognize and encourage the one hopeful sign of orchestral life in recent years: the willingness of a few smaller-city groups to extend their programs into the mid-20th century, to commission new works, and to explore the full range of the traditional literature as well. But this tendency forms no part of Ford's assessment of the vitality of the American orchestral scene; those orchestras mainly responsible for it (Buffalo, St. Louis, Kansas City) are not even mentioned among those capable of living up to "high professional criteria."

As far as the actual effects of the new project are concerned, I see no reason to suppose, as several of my journalistic colleagues already appear to have done, that the same administrators, artistic directors, players and critics who have generated and maintained the present orchestral miasma, should become adventurous, responsible and energetic merely because a great deal of money has suddenly been made unconditionally available to them. And why one should further suppose that any dedicated and educated young musician would be especially attracted to an institution whose imaginative poverty and irresponsibility have thus been officially enshrined and perpetuated is beyond my inferential capacities.

Here, presumably, is Ford's final solution to the culture problem: if an institution can support itself popularly, then both the value of its methods and its cultural significance have thereby been definitively proved, and it therefore deserves additional support by the full resources and prestige of the Ford Foundation. Conversely, to support an aspect or a segment of artistic life manifestly in desperate need of it is apparently regarded as an act of gratuitous interference with natural forces, upsetting balances achieved — between, for example, such equally matched contenders for popular approval as the Boston Pops Orchestra and a twelve-tone composer — within the profession itself. Although the Ford Foundation has never entrusted any of its projects directly to composers at all—they have been involved only functionally in grants to "established" opera companies, to secondary schools, to concert artists and to orchestras—it has managed to grant about $3 million over the last ten years projects involving new music, which the cost of operatic prod

grants to concert artists account

DANTON'S DEATH

A genius, George Buechner (1813-37) wrote Danton's Death at the age of 22. The play was so far in advance of its time that it was not given a production till sixty-seven years after its composition. Not only were its technical demands beyond the capacities of the 19th-century stage, but its artistic character and inner significance are difficult to appreciate by any audience not profoundly aware through personal and social experience of the contradictions between action and being, feeling and behavior.

"History walks on two feet," in other words, it is man made. Yet the men who make it are different from what they make. The consequences of the historical process exceed the intentions of those who set it in motion. There is an inexorability in the march of history which almost inevitably overwhelms and discards its leading actors.

Though Buechner was himself a radical, he understood the tragedy of revolution. "The Revolution," he has Danton say, "eats its own children." This is not because of the villainy of particular people. There are no heroes or villains in Danton's Death. In this lies one of the most impressive attributes of the play. In brief scenes which move hectically and spasmodically like the turbulent events of history itself, scenes dense with characters of crucial importance who are at the same time almost no more central than the passing fragments of the surrounding mob, one senses the palpably human fabric, the very texture of history.

Danton is that complex of traits which mingles the burning idealism,

All presented as straws in the fateful rm of destiny.

So rich a play, it would seem, nnot but produce a tremendous ef- t on the stage. But a miracle has :n wrought at the Vivian Beau- nt Theater (Lincoln Center). The y has not simply been rendered ll but made almost wholly unin- ligible, communicating next to thing.

I am not being supercilious when speak of this as a "miracle." The th is that I am not quite certain w the phenomenon has been ought about. The actors have strong ices and articulate clearly enough in fact they are often given to outing — but one does not really low what is being said. Meaning nehow fades in mid-air. One does t even enjoy the masochistic pleas- e of being bored or outraged; one simply reduced to a state of inani- n. The performance has no definite esence; one sits in the theatre as enveloped in a vacuum.

I am sure that the director, Her- rt Blau, a most intelligent man, un- rstands the play. But his under- nding has taken no specific shape. e actors have not been transformed rough clearly marked characteriza- n. No character lives as a charac- . (Perhaps the only exception is bespierre who strikes one as a Re- blican appointee to the judgeship a small American town.) Many of e actors appear embarrassed by the rds they mouth as if there were a avage separating language from e person. The dialogue, more in- lved in this translation than in any her and certainly less lucid than e original German, seems to issue m inanimate sources.

The scenic scheme, elaborate and pensive, also fails to register. Some the most important scenes are ayed on the forestage (really an ron attached to a proscenium) so at instead of creating any sense of vironment we get the impression of tors at rehearsal handicapped by ck of props or proper space. Physi- lly the production is altogether without atmosphere except for the mechanics of a revolving stage floor, sliding panels, set pieces advancing toward us on tracks.

My bewilderment at what was happening or not happening in this notable play (which I had previously seen in two different and thrilling German productions) was so upsetting that I began to blame the very edifice in which I found myself. Perhaps, I thought, the theatre itself, a combination of imposing architectural forms, with large esplanades fronted by a gigantic Henry Moore sculpture and a square pool, with an interior which is neither exactly intimate nor epically sweeping, was at fault. But that is going too far! The trouble lies elsewhere. There is some deep incongruity in the assembled elements: the text, the company, the audience (what's Hecuba to them or they to Hecuba?), the premises and the auspices of the occasion.

I have often asserted that a repertory theatre of the sort Lincoln Center aims to provide must be allowed at least three seasons to prove itself. Thus nothing I have said about the first production of the season under the new management must be construed as a condemnation of the entire enterprise, though it is certainly a cause for worry.

JULIET OF THE SPIRITS

THE RAILROAD MAN

Fellini's Juliet of the Spirits, which has come into New York with the kind of journalistic bugling usually reserved for visits by heads of state, turns out to be a millinery and lingerie extravaganza that recalls, though at a level of greater competence, the jaded surrealism of the American cinematic underground. For two and a half hours it proliferates pseudo-psychiatric fantasy in the chemical pastels of technicolor to create a world of marzipan decadence (in all justice, the film must be given credit for projecting a sense of sweet and sticky evil). It is expensive, derivative, self-indulgent and a bore. I have no doubt that Fellini intends his new film to be ironic and sophisticated, but it turns out arch and chic.

At the focus of all the flouncing is, of course, Giulietta Masina, she of the candid eyes and vulnerable smile. As ever Cinderella, it is Signora Fellini's misfortune this time to be deeply in love with a peacock husband (Mario Pisu) who scarcely troubles to conceal his infidelity, and to be subject to baroque hallucinations induced by her present unhappiness, her childhood indoctrination by hysteric nuns and a disposition to put trust in soothsayers, mystics and swamis. Juliet's reveries—her spirits—supply opportunities for the more extravagant Bergdorf Goodman revels, but the somewhat hazy point of the film seems to be that the world of reality has become for her only a degree less whimsical than her dreams. She inhabits a blancmange house in a pistachio and chocolate forest; her next-door neighbor is some kind of sexual technician who is camping out in a derelict mansion liberally supplied with mirrors, who has herself conveyed to the beach in a litter borrowed from some recent Serpent of the Nile production and who entertains playboys in a tree house to which one gains access by an electric-powered wicker basket.

than it may seem at first thought. Dreams tend to be clichés and anyone who goes in for deliberately concocting them runs the danger of being more extravagant than original. There was one elegant circus sequence in Juliet of the Spirits, and it reminded me that too many long stretches elsewhere in the film looked like Ringling Brothers in its years of desuetude.

The action of the film is the emancipation of Juliet from the domineering illusions of her contemporaries and the crippling superstitions of her past. She wins her freedom with the help of the wraith of her grandfather, a lascivious old atheist who travels about with a bareback rider in a Wright Brothers' airplane. Juliet's friends and family (haughty mother and cruel sisters) are garbed about evenly as Diaghilev hobgoblins and George White show girls. Indeed, the picture could be compressed into a fifteen-minute production number with little loss of content and a great economy of time. A big finale with Mae West stage center.

Twelve years ago, when Salt of the Earth was just out of the cutting room and ready for the theatres, Herbert Biberman, Michael Wilson and Paul Jarrico, respectively, director, author and producer of the film, were all on the Hollywood blacklist. Understandably, the picture got few bookings (it's a miracle it got any) and the present "revival" is virtually a first run.

The passage of time may be a help to the picture. Its content exhibits a struggle between a naive and stilted social message and the persuasive and endearing performances of a predominantly Mexican cast. Being in any case a little dated, the pamphleteering can now be accepted as period quaintness, and attention focused on the detail that gives the film vitality.

The story concerns a lead mine in New Mexico, which is on strike because the workers, first-generation immigrants, demand the same pay and conditions as prevail in the "Anglo" mines operated by the company elsewhere in the region. The Mexicans' living conditions are also inferior, and their wives wish that such matters as hot water and indoor plumbing might be made part of the union demands. However, the husbands dismiss these issues—as indeed they dismiss their wives—as not worth a man's serious attention.

A Taft-Hartley injunction bars miners from the picket line. The men are thrown into despair; they would settle. But the wives seize the picket signs from their drooping shoulders, face the wicked bosses with a female defiance they are not equipped to counter, and win both the strike and the respect of their husbands. Solidarity forever and momism, Latin style.

But the performances of Rosaura Revueltas and Juan Chacon as the leading Mexican couple, of Clinton and Virginia Jencks as a husband-and-wife organizing team, and of the supporting cast provide a steady incidence of national contrast and domestic interplay that is as witty and genuine as the film's overall posture is pompously doctrinaire. It is astonishing how these good actors find scope for individuality and a seeming improvisation within the stiff mechanics of the plot. Biberman is a subtle director of human behavior, however simplistic his understanding is (or was) of the war between the reptilian bosses and the noble serfs.

Another film that is a little simple-minded as to plot—but not saved by internal veracity—is Pie Germi's The Railroad Man. T homily in the style of Italian reali tells of an engineer who runs dow suicide, through no fault of his ov but who then, because of a repu tion for hard drinking, is dismis by the company. Comes a strike a the fallen hero of the wine shops sc from bitterness and wounded pri Ostracism ensues, but is lifted— Italian indulgence toward hum weakness—in time to afford the king of the rails the most joy Christmas of his life—so joyous, deed, that he dies of a heart att in the fullness of love for the wh world.

Germi plays the lead himself, a that perhaps explains why he unc took the film. It is a role to deli the swashbuckler that lurks in ev actor. The film is easy remorse a healing embraces all the way hom immoral like all sentimentality in t it teaches that a man may dance life and not pay the fiddler. A sh gun marriage subplot involves engineer's daughter and a groc clerk; it also works out to sunsh and the benevolence of tears.

A decision to prosecute for political deviation or for large-scale riot is not made by the prosecutor who appears in court, but by the politically responsible administration — in this case, City Hall. The city fathers —and in particular their spokesman, City Counsel President Paul Screvane, recently defeated for the Democratic Mayoralty nomination — belong to that ever-growing school of public officials who are convinced that a problem can be made to disappear if the Reds can be linked to it. Soon after the rioting began, Screvane, then Acting Mayor, proceeded to ascribe the affair to what he called "fringe groups including the Communist Party." In the long, hot summer of 1964 the easy opportunism of a political prosecution was attractive, both as a means of vindicating the police and of avoiding confrontation with the problems which the riot had flung into New York's fa

One with Ninevah?

New York City

Dear Sirs: I am shocked to laughter by the almost hysterical reaction of the Administration and its allies concerning the anti-Vietnam War rallies. On second thought, however, this overreaction should not be a cause for joy to those of us who have supported these rallies. . . . It bodes ill for the very reason that the Administration evidently does not understand the tenor of these rallies, does not comprehend the minds of those, mainly students, who are participating, does not grasp the meaning that these students bring for the future. . . . Their minds and their hearts are the future of our country, for they are the true lovers of America.

And what will happen to us if they are cast aside? . . . We are now, and in two generations time we will still be, the most powerful nation on earth. But will we be America? . . . Or will we be Assyria, the Assyria which rose like a comet, whose raw power conquered the world, but which soon disappeared, forgotten, men with mailed fist but no heart? The Administration should listen to these students. . . . Their anguish, their laments, even their rage is our grace; their presence is our grasp into the true American future, a lovely and beautiful country, of strong and just and humane men. Philip Siekevitz

Dear Sirs: After all that has been written on the New Left, it seems relevant to underline that its existence is a challenge to the whole Left to unite in political action and organization. . . . The objectives of the peace movement must go beyond ending the war in Vietnam to changing the foreign policy which requires such wars, and replacing the economic system which develops such a foreign policy. . . . If the Left of today is to do these things it must be better, more powerful, than the Left of the 1930s, and to be better it must first of all be as good. . . . The student movement itself inevitably has a turnover of more than 25 per cent a year and rests on the annual recruitment of freshmen. . . . Even the strongest revolving student movement requires an organization into which to graduate. . . .

Can the New Left find a way to add 15 million organized workers to those already organized? To do better than the Left of the 1930s, not only must that be done but a radical political party must be organized, stronger in New York State than was the American Labor Party, which had trade union support, and stronger and more enduring nationally than the Progressive Party of 1948. For lasting results, political action and political organization cannot be ignored just because the parents of youth now constituting the New Left suffered subsequent defeat.

Activities for civil rights, for peace, and to raise the standards of those who live in ghettos are good in themselves. . . . But the broad objective of America for the Americans, Negro as well as white, and peace for America (meaning Asia for Asians, and so forth) requires a radical political party. And a political party requires an ideology, not unity through "knowing nothing." J. B. C. Woods

High cost of killing

Los Angeles, Calif.

Dear Sirs: If you watch such TV fare as Combat, Convoy, The Lieutenant, War Zone or any of the late, late war movies, you will see that one resourceful lieutenant or sergeant with a single squad of dedicated men, be it World War I or II or the Korean or Civil Wars, were all that were needed to destroy a bridge or set off an ammunition dump or capture a command post or control a road junction.

Today it's different. It takes a couple of dozen mammoth B-25s based in Guam or the entire Seventh Fleet to do the same thing. And you know what that costs.

Vote for democracy

Miami, Fla.

Dear Sirs: The war mongers were sure upset about the peace mongers protesting our part in their current war. But you just can't please everybody, so let the record show that some people do support our efforts to impose "freedom" on the Vietnamese, whether they want it or not. But I would like to cast my vote for democracy. Why can't we allow the Vietnamese to decide for themselves what they want? Or is that what the peace demonstrators were suggesting?

ere has never been anything like it since Thomas lison established the first American central power ›n in New York City in 1881. For twelve hours, chilly autumn night, electric power failed all New England, New York State, parts of other s as far west as Michigan, and across the Cana- border into Ontario. In New York City life as we / it came to a standstill. The traffic lights were and monumental traffic jams resulted. As many 00,000 riders may have been imprisoned in the 'ay during the evening rush hour, other thou s were trapped in elevators. That there was no c, that the city and its suburbs continued to tion after a fashion, is to the credit of the citi- . the police, and the radio newscasters, whose and for once human voices came from every sistor set in the area. Nevertheless, some grave tions remain to be answered.

r years the Consolidated Edison Company, which lies electric power and gas to New York and its hern suburbs, has been advertising on the radio its interconnections with other power companies down the cost of electricity for consumers, and ugh this is unmentioned in the broadcasts) keep lividends for the stockholders. The grid thus cre- was the pride of electrical power engineers, it lleled other regional grids, and the industry look- orward to an ultimate linking up of all the elec- power resources of the nation into a few great ems. Consolidated Edison by itself is enormous. a capacity of well over 7,000 megawatts (a mega- . is a million watts or a thousand kilowatts), and chief partner in the grid was upstate Niagara ıawk, about equally big. Both companies were d for bold and progressive engineering, in cer- directions at least. Con Edison, for instance, re- tly installed the largest turbogenerator in the ld, a 1,000-megawatt unit at its Ravenswood sta- , opposite the United Nations on the East River. that installation in itself is evidence of the fact the zeal of Con Edison's engineers is not matched vhat might be called scientific prudence. The lubri- ng pumps of the giant turbines were operated by tricity, with no alternate stand-by power, and when current failed, the main bearings burned and the erator was disabled for upward of a week.

. E. Slade, executive vice president of Iowa Power Light, was quoted by The Wall Street Journal as eving that blackouts of a similar scope are a fairly ng probability for the future. The industry, he , has been guilty of a "too rapid push on the tic," and he cites two smaller power failures that e occurred in the pool in which his company par- pates.

on Edison admits itself baffled by the most recent disaster and gives no guarantee that the darkness will not fall again. It seems, however, to feel no embarrassment at a display of ineptitude that carries the threat of catastrophe, and indeed uses the occasion to lash out at the conservation forces which have attempted to block its despoliation of Storm King [see article by David Cort, p. 387] and to threaten a further increase in consumer rates.

But what has happened in New York City, and in Boston and other cities, is dismaying on a scale as great as the power companies' technological and business success. The story as it appears on the morning after is that when the breakdown occurred Con Edison was drawing some 300,000 kilowatts from the 345,000-volt feeder line connecting it with Niagara Mohawk.

If that account is correct, the strange feature is that the Con Edison system was knocked out beyond speedy restoration by a tie line which at the time of the trouble was supplying only about 6 per cent of the city's power. Apparently there was sufficient protection for the Con Edison plants, which dumped load when matters got out of hand upstate, but there was no reverse current protection, set to operate ahead of and to shield the local devices. The power which Con Edison was buying from Niagara Mohawk cost a little less than its own power, but what does it avail a utility if it gets a block of power at a reduction of a few thousand dollars only to suffer a potentially disastrous outrage? Engineers will long be discussing what happened, but the principle is clear: continuity of service is vital, and instability cannot be tolerated on systems so vital for public safety and convenience.

The Great Draft-Card Hubbub

There is widespread misunderstanding about the crime of burning a draft card, on the part of both those who condemn it and the minority who approve. The punishment seems excessive—and indeed it is—but five years in jail or a $10,000 fine or both are uniform penalties for all violations of Selective Service provisions, including refusal to report for induction, failing to register, failing to report a change of address, etc. Of course the full penalties are not always, or usually, invoked, but they are on the books for use when the government deems it appropriate.

A parallel case would develop if some John Doe became infuriated by the annual sacrifice on the highways of 40,000 or 50,000 lives. As a symbolic act of protest, he blocks traffic on, say, the Golden Gate Bridge and there, having alerted the television networks, he holds his driver's license aloft and in the glare of the floodlights burns it. Clearly he has committed several misdemeanors, and will commit another if he drives without the license in his pocket, but he did not commit a moral or legal wrong.

In other words, the new statute against public incineration of draft cards is not aimed at a substantive evil. It is designed to discourage a form of unorthodox and hence publicity-generating protest. The act was signed by the President on August 31 after being rushed through the Congress with virtually no consideration. It was a pet project of L. Mendel Rivers (D., S.C.), Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and one of the leading war hawks. With his usual elegance, Rivers refers to draft-card burners as scum, filth, etc.

Selective Service did not ask for the measure; nor has Selective Service anything to do with enforcement—that devolves on the Department of Justice. And the crucial factor in draft evasion is not the presence or absence of a card but the record of a name—or absence of that record—in the files of a local draft board. Registrants' names are a matter of public record and, according to Selective Service, local boards soon become aware of attempted evasion. For one thing, parents whose sons have been drafted often report youths who have failed to register.

The American Civil Liberties Union takes no stand on the merits or demerits of U.S. foreign policy, in Vietnam or elsewhere, but it is opposed to the draft-burning penalty on constitutional and other legal grounds. It is held to punish a political action, it serves no necessary or legitimate purpose, and it is an infringement of the right of free speech, which includes symbolic acts as well as verbal expression. The New York Civil Liberties Union is defending David J. Miller, the 22-year-old pacifist who burned his draft card in public on October 15, to insure that infractions of constitutional rights do not result from reaction against this form of protest.

The Negro on TV

In the Washington Evening Star, Walter Pincus has recently given accounts of an interesting pair of questions in the field of race relations: (1) Are Negroes entitled to protection against discrimination in broadcasting? (2) Should the Federal Communications Commission license radio and TV stations which propose to supply specialized service to Negroes? In at least one case the answer to the first question, though far from clear-cut, is in the affirmative. Up to about a year ago, a Jackson, Miss., station, WLBT-TV, was managed by a member of the local White Citizens Council on an openly segregationist basis. The station editorialized against integration, refused Negroes equal time on civil rights issues, programed on a lily-white pattern, and never used "courtesy titles" —Mr., Mrs. and Miss—in referring to Negroes.

Beginning in 1963, WLBT's electronic racism came under serious challenge. The Office of Communications of the United Church of Christ joined with Mississippi civil rights leaders to monitor the station's programs, and the record was filed with the FCC in support of a petition to deny renewal of the station's license. The FCC did renew, but only for one year, and with the provision that the station "comply st ly" with the fairness doctrine of handling civil ri issues and "immediately cease" discriminatory graming. The FCC refused to recognize the chur right to intervene, although the material prese had obviously played a part in the proceeding. church has now gone to the U.S. Court of Appeal have its standing in the controversy upheld and license-renewal decision reversed.

Thus WLBT is sitting with a time bomb unde chair. A license of its type is estimated to be w more than $2 million, and even the Murchison br ers, who are the beneficial owners, take a coupl millions seriously. The station retained the Wash ton firm of Arnold & Fortas. Paul Porter, a for FCC chairman, became involved in the case, anc portedly forced programing and personnel chan The White Citizens man was succeeded by a general manager, who has held meetings with N civil rights leaders, including Aaron Henry and Cha Evers. Some Negro entertainment and sports mat is now broadcast, and a local Negro institution, To loo College, is to be given a place on the stati "Know Your College" series. WLBT's license ren comes up again next June, and the United Ch is monitoring not only that station but 118 televi and 900 radio stations in nine Southern states.

Specialized Negro TV has been proposed in M land and Illinois and promises to become a recur question in metropolitan centers with large N populations. Until recently, no new TV channels available, VHF being fully allocated while UHF nothing but a sure way to lose money. Now, ever, with manufacture of all-channel receivers m datory, the 70 UHF wave lengths are coming demand. In Chicago, two groups are contending the city's last unassigned UHF channel. One is Chicago Federation of Labor and Industrial U Council, which already operates a nonprofit r station and seeks to expand into television. The o is Chicagoland TV, a company owned chiefly by Negroes. If Chicagoland gets the license, it will the station primarily to attract a Negro audienc

A number of foreign-language radio broadcas stations are in operation, but this seems a dub precedent for TV, where differentiation would based on race, not language. Some Negro lea favor Negro-oriented TV, but a majority appea be opposed, on the ground that it would ten perpetuate a feeling of separateness on the par Negroes and other racial minorities. Another a ment is that if the station wished to broadcast terial in favor of integration, few whites woul in the audience and Negroes would be talking to groes, as leftists have talked mostly to leftists in past. As for routine programing, there is no re to believe that it would be ethically or culturally perior; Negro TV would be no less commercial white TV. The argument that Negroes do not enough of themselves on TV is perfectly valid, the WLBT experience indicates that with a frow

C looking over their shoulders, station owners are sceptible to reason. The networks have taken some nid steps toward integrated broadcasting, and an celeration of this trend is surely preferable to elec- onic segregation.

n Epidemic of the Heart

In the first weeks of November, we moved from rning our draft cards to making torches of con- ience of our own bodies. These gestures deeply ouble many who share the hatred of the Vietnam ar—and of all war—which motivates them. It is lt, of the first, that it may be interpreted as a state- ent of personal disaffiliation rather than as an act sed on principle; and of the second, that the heart- reaking desperation of the deed may lend credence those who pretend that opposition to Mr. John- n's holocaust is evidence of fanaticism. The risk of strangement is indeed implicit in these symbolic estures, but they will have that effect primarily on ose who see Vietnam as a political issue, or even s an issue of military power—matters, that is, on hich responsible men may reasonably differ.

But it has become obvious in recent weeks (to all, at is, but the Administration spokesmen who have fted the reedy cry of Communist infiltration against he opposition that now threatens to engulf them) hat the resistance to the war against the people of ietnam has shifted from logic and logistics to mo- ality. In the moral context, symbols become relevant. ndeed, no Christian will deny the power of martyr- om; the great edifice of his church is built upon it.

It is probable that this shift in the generative power of the opposition foretells the end of Mr. Johnson's attempt to find peace through escalation. The new form of resistance is incalculably stronger, and for two reasons. In the first place, it cannot be confused and divided by argument over facts, to which the Administration can always claim superior access. Official rationalizations, seeking to prove that war is an instrument of peace, are powerless against a monolithic conviction that this war is wrong.

And in second place, a moral crusade does not grow by the slow arithmetic of logic but by the germs of conscience. They infect everyone — believer and atheist, rich and poor, scholar and artisan — in a sweeping epidemic of the heart. It is a central fact of the new situation that the clergymen of the country, who were in many cases moved to action by the nation-wide student protest, find that their outcry against the Vietnam slaughter gains them a congregation that is oblivious to sectarian lines. Priest, rabbi and minister are breaking what Dr. Howard Schomer, president of Chicago Theological Seminary, calls "the dialogue of the deaf."

The time of argument is over; strategy is no longer relevant. The Johnson Administration today is faced with a tide of moral indignation that swells with every passing hour. It will not be stopped by threats and bluster, and the President does not hold (nor do we believe he would use) the instruments of tyranny. The best minds in Congress have publicly parted from him, the teachers and clergy are his most vocal critics, youth is up in arms. Mr. Johnson may still count a statistical majority of support, but it is melting even as the polls he so reveres are rushed to his desk. The people are speaking now from their hearts.

Schism Within A Dilemma . . . . .

ohn V. Lindsay notwithstanding, he elections of November 2 offered o compelling sign of a resurgent epublican Party. To be sure, vot- rs in New York, Philadelphia and leveland expressed a strong sense f dissatisfaction by turning against he administrations in power. But hey did so only within limits, and hey were looking not so much for Republicans as for new faces.

Though New Yorkers elected Lindsay, they rejected his two run- ning mates. They kept the City Council Democratic with a substantial 30-to-7 majority, and actually unseated an incumbent Lindsay supporter as borough president of the Bronx. It is even likely that they will fill the Congressional seat that Lindsay vacates with a Democrat. They demonstrated a preference for Mr. Lindsay himself, but no confidence in his party.

In Philadelphia, the voters slapped down another superannuated Democratic administration by electing Arlen Specter as district attorney. Specter, once a liberal Democrat, had the support of the ADA and other liberal political groups. He decided to run as a Republican when he failed to get his own party's nomination.

Cleveland came close to throwing out its Democratic mayor. Ralph S. Locher emerged a narrow minority winner with some 63 per cent of the vote against him, two anti-machine Democratic candidates having diverted 46 per cent of the anti-Locher vote. Fewer than 17 per cent voted for the Republican candidate. The returns indicated serious discontent with Locher but no particular fondness for Republicans.

The New York Times, which backed Lindsay, took the scattered Republican victories to mean: "The emergence of a new breed of Republican big-city winners, who play down their partisanship and play up their promise of civil uplift (for the independents) and civil rights (for the Negroes)." There were scarcely enough such winners to make up a fair sampling, but even assuming that the Times was right, do the Republican victories of 1965 have any significance for the national party? A political party, as Americans commonly understand it, cannot be satisfied with a handful of local offices but must aspire to power at the federal level. Do the victories mean that the Republicans have improved their competitive position in the nation?

National Chairman Ray Bliss and other Republicans, after surveying the wreckage of the Goldwater debacle, concluded some months ago that the party's most serious area of weakness was in the cities. Several columnists have already written that the 1965 elections show this weakness to be repaired and the Republican Party to be once again an urban competitor.

But Mr. Lindsay was not willing to gamble on that possibility. He accepted nomination from both the Republican and Liberal Parties. But as a campaigner, he abandoned the Republican label completely and ran as a nonpartisan "fusion" candidate. (Asked by a television interviewer whether he was in the "fusion" tradition of La Guardia, Lindsay replied: "Sure. There's Mollen, he's a Democrat and running with me for controller; there's Costello, he's a Liberal and running with me for council president; and there's me. I'm running for mayor.") He bypassed the Republican city machinery and went conspicuously, even rudely, out of his way to dissociate himself from the formal leadership. Senator Javits, New York's most successful Republican, supported Lindsay with great energy but not without misgivings. Javits, loyal to the party's organization if not to its doctrines, thought Lindsay overdid it. But the final vote proves that the Republican nomination alone would not have been enough. For a Protestant Republican, Lindsay ran well among Jews, Negroes, Italians and Puerto Ricans, but he received far from a majority. He polled 873,000 votes as the candidate of the Republican Party and 293,000 votes as the candidate of the Liberal Party. Lindsay won by 136,000 votes out of 2,500,000 cast, and the Liberal vote made the difference.

But an even more compelling reason than election statistics for questioning the urban potential of the Republican Party is the way in which Republicans in Washington have treated the cities. Lindsay, like any thoughtful city dweller, recognizes that the only possible escape from the dilemma of swelling problems and a shrinking tax base is through greater federal assistance. But one need not point to Barry Goldwater to show that the Republican Party—as distinguished from individual urban Republicans like Lindsay and Javits—is not the party to come to the rescue. Year after year, the Republicans in Congress have given convincing proof of their disregard for matters of the utmost importance to the cities.

The voting pattern of Republicans in Congress during the last session maintained that stance. In the key House vote on the housing and urban rehabilitation bill, 130 Republicans were recorded against, 4 in favor. The four were Lindsay, Halpern, Reid and Horton, all of New York. In the Senate, the Republican tally was 7 in favor, 19 against. The Republican vote in the House on the basic provision to establish a Department of Housing and Urban Development was 5 in favor, 122 against. House Republicans voted 35 in favor, 96 against federal aid to public schools. They voted 65 in favor, 73 against medicare. They voted 121 to 19 to place extra restrictions on the immigration reform bill. Such a record suggests that the cities would be signing their own death warrants if they voted Republicans into national office. It is unlikely that the cities will be unaware of this and walk heedlessly into that disaster.

Wayne Dumont, rather than Lindsay, might very well be looked at as the big lesson of the 1965 election, though it is a very shabby lesson indeed. Dumont, a conventional Republican who has long aspired to the governorship of New Jersey, found no better campaign issue in a state beset with problems of growth and change than an indiscreet statement by Eugene Genovese, a then obscure Rutgers professor, about the war in Vietnam. [See Genovese: The Political Economy of Slavery, reviewed by Aileen S. Kraditor, p. 390.] Dumont and the New Jersey Republican Party, which until a decade ago dominated the state, showed themselves intellectually bankrupt. They made absolutely no effort to offer sol tions to New Jersey's needs. B bringing in Richard Nixon the simply emphasized the void.

The electorate responded to th Dumont campaign by yawning th Republicans off the ballot. Gove nor Hughes, who has conducted sound if unexciting administratio was overwhelmingly re-elected an into office with him came the firs Democratic legislature in a hal century. The Republicans were s badly beaten that their organizations were disrupted down to th county level. If the party is to com back at all, the recovery will tak a massive effort and years of rebuilding. The inept Dumont seeme to prove that if the Republican could come up with nothing bette than right-wing demagogy the would have to pay a heavy pric for it.

That lesson might have bee salutary, but alas in Virginia th Republican experience was almos precisely the contrary, and onl slightly less exasperating. A. Linwood Holton, a young attorney fro Roanoke, made what had been advertised as the first serious Republican effort in a century to win th Statehouse. Like his Democratic opponent, Lieutenant Governor Mill E. Godwin, he bowed to the ne voting power of Virginia Negroe and chose to conduct a decent an moderate campaign. The race issu was scarcely mentioned by eithe Republican or Democrat throughout the campaign. But Godwin, wh has made an amazing transition i recent years from extreme racis to relative liberalism, had the support not only of Harry Byrd's ol courthouse crowd but also of labor liberal Democrats and most Negr groups. Holton, on the other hand was punished for his moderatio with a Conservative Party candidate, one William J. Story, runnin on his right. Story, an avowed segregationist and John Bircher, wo heavily in southside Virginia, wher the schools were once closed t avert integration. Godwin was th first Virginia Democrat in memor to receive less than a majority o the votes for governor, but Holton thanks to Story, ran behind the lackluster Republicans of previous gubernatorial contests. If the lesso of the Dumont defeat was that Republicans could not win with extremists in the North, the lesson o the Holton defeat seemed to be tha

othing to say that Hughes couldn't say more convincingly. The moderates simply can't find good reasons why anyone should vote for them, unless it's to save the two-party system, and a party ought to contend for votes with something more arresting than a pitiful plea for its own preservation.

It was no coincidence that the moderates disintegrated last year before the Republican rightist onslaught. They knew they couldn't fight something with nothing. At best, their alternative to extremism was a pallid version of the Democratic presentation. If he said nothing else that made sense during the entire campaign, Goldwater was right that he offered the electorate "a choice, not an echo." And his followers made a good case for going South, rather than left, in quest of votes. Since Republicans can't out-Robin Hood the Democrats, they might as well offer the reverse. Southern whites were obviously receptive, and in politics one makes alliances where one has a chance to win.

The extremists, whatever else one may say about them, believe in something. They'll fight any time against anybody in behalf of their cause. They'll even take on Karl Mundt, the second or third worst reactionary in the Senate, to show their devotion to their principles. And like Buckley in New York and Story in Virginia, they'll feel sufficiently redeemed, no matter how badly beaten, for having accepted the challenge.

The fight inside the party rages more furiously than ever. In the summer of 1964, the country was treated to a lot of fantasy about how Goldwater would defeat Johnson. It is interesting to note that Republicans have stopped talking about beating Democrats. Now they talk only about defeating one another. Dirksen and Ford, former stalking-horses for reaction, demand that the Birchers get out of the party. Sen. Thruston Morton, the Kentucky barometer, recently said the Birch Society was "as dangerous as the Ku Klux Klan and the Communist Party." But fair Ronnie Reagan marches onward to the gubernatorial nomination in California, which the moderate Senator Kuchel doesn't want, and Mrs. Phyllis Schlafly, defender of Birchers and writer of Goldwater diatribes, advances toward the presidency of the powerful National Federation of Republican Women. Extremists of the Right are as busy as ever acquiring control of party machinery or consolidating what control they have. The prospect of another Goldwater debacle seems to whet their appetites. Meanwhile, the moderates look on impotently.

But what of Lindsay, the hero of 1965? Can he reverse this course? Even before his victory, the handicappers talked of him as a Republican Presidential possibility. He has, of course, the personality and a winning record as a candidate. But he has obstacles. Two New York Republicans, Rockefeller and Javits, are standing in line ahead of him and it will take some fancy footwork to pass them. He has the even tougher job of deriving any credit from managing the chaotic affairs of New York City. With what was probably the largest, most skilled, best prepared and highest paid campaign staff for any local election in history, Lindsay failed to come up with any stunning ideas for restoring civilization to New York. He made a lot of promises, however, and he'll have to make good on most of them before he can climb another step on the political ladder.

But Lindsay's most difficult obstacle to winning the Presidency is getting the Republican nomination. Though more curious things have happened in politics, it staggers the mind to imagine that the party which chose Goldwater would choose Lindsay. The Republicans would not nominate Rockefeller, who could have paid his own way and who in 1960 would probably have won. They would sooner nominate Javits, who is liberal and Jewish but has at least never denied his Republican allegiance. Throu out its history the Republican Pa has not been good to its maveri of the left. It made a pariah out La Guardia, the last reform ma of New York and a better politici than Lindsay. Walter Lippma looking desperately for signs th the party has mended its ways, sists that Lindsay is "in the ma line of Republicanism as it con down from Lincoln and Theod Roosevelt," but he fails to menti that the party finally estrang them both. Senator Dirksen has clared, quite indignantly, that t John Birch Society "smacks of t old Know-Nothing Party" and he quite right. But he does not go to say that the old Know-Nothi Party lost its identity by mergi into the Republican Party, where created a tradition more enduri than that of Lincoln and Theod Roosevelt.

It is not at all impossible th the American people would el Lindsay President; what does see impossible now is that they shou ever get a chance to vote for hi More dismaying still, the Repub can Party shows no sign of eme ing from its internecine gougi with an alternative instrument salvation.

TURKEY

The Discovery of Politics . . . . Constantine Poulo

Istanbul

Superficially, the recent Turkish elections suggest that Turkey's peasants and villagers still prefer an Islamic theocracy to a Western-style secular democracy. A deeper look uncovers the paradox inherent in modern Turkish political affairs, and its potential effect on NATO's eastern flank.

The Justice Party, which won an unexpectedly overwhelming vote and a decisive majority of seats in the Turkish parliament, is the party of the financial interests, big business and most of the big landowners. Its basic electoral support came, however, from the rural proletariat. The Justice Party is the overt and direct heir to Mr. Adnan Menderes' Democratic Party, which was outlawed after the military coup d'état of 1960. Mr. Menderes and other leaders of the party (and government) were executed for having "violated the constitution" by suppressing the opposition, misusing power and changing the electoral laws to perpetuate their rule.

Second in the elections was the Republican People's Party, led by aging former Premier Ismet Inonu, who with Kemal Ataturk—founder of the Turkish Republic — established the party forty-two years ago. Of the six other minor parties represented in the election, the newly formed Turkish Workers' Party — the first Marxist-oriented political grouping permitted to exist in Turkey since 1925—contributed significantly to the pre-election debate. The electoral struggle, ho ever, was a duel between the t major parties.

The Republican People's Par conducting a pedestrian campai relied as it has for almost two d ades on the mantle of Ataturk carry it through. Not even "mil progressive," the party lost its tionalistic revolutionary fer many years ago, and when Inonu announced last summer th the ideology of the party wo henceforth veer "left of center" was not persuasive. His party's sentially bourgeois support, bas on the army officer corps (35,0 on the active list), the state reaucracy, small industrialists a businessmen, and a few big lar owners, seemed to rule out a possibility of a dynamic, imagi tive program. The victorious Justice Party, off- ring of the self-destructive Dem- ratic Party, effectively exploited e ghost and "martyrdom" of Mr. enderes. It played stridently on e resentment still lingering over enderes' execution. His eldest son ıs placed on the Justice Party ·ket, as were the son, a daughter ıd a widow of other ousted Dem- ratic Party leaders. The party lopted as its symbol a white-gray ırse, a device that takes punning lvantage of legend. For the Ana- lian peasant, an iron-gray horse demirkirat, as close as they can ›proximate the now Western word, lemocrat"; and a horse of this par- cular shade has Robin Hoodish ssociations in the rural folklore. y using the horse symbol, the aders of the Justice Party clever- by-passed the law forbidding any ference to Mr. Menderes' ill-fated arty.

The Justice Party also made good nd plentiful use of smear tactics. . freely stigmatized both Mr. ıonu's People's Party and the new Vorkers' Party as "Communist." It istributed throughout Turkey hun- reds of thousands of photographs howing Mr. Inonu kissing Mrs. ındrei Gromyko's hand at a diplo- natic reception in Ankara. For the ıuge illiterate masses of Anatolia communism" is anathema because t means "Russia," the historical nemy of Turkey. Added to that is he ingrained belief that "Russia" ınd "Communist" mean abolition ıf private property, confiscation of ivestock, religious persecution by he godless (shades of Ataturk), ree love and "other shocking prac- ices."

The major significance of he election is that the campaign lid, however, evolve into a discus- sion of economic and social issues rather than wrangle over personalities and purely political debating points as in the past. Credit for this must go largely to the Workers' Party. Its platform, drawn up by intellectuals, called for nationalization of all major industries, although it pledged to leave room for a degree of private enterprise for "some time to come." It advocated drastic land reform and rapid industrialization supported mainly by state capital. It also suggested nationalization of foreign trade and banking. It favored Turkey's withdrawal from NATO and the improvement of the country's relations with the Soviet bloc and the nonaligned nations.

Although naive, in some ways unserious and deliberately overdrawn, this appeal to the Turkish masses to overthrow the feudal landlords, usurers, officials and professional politicians who have exploited them for centuries marked a hesitant step toward a better, though still far distant, future. The Workers' Party forced public discussion of such issues as foreign oil exploration (and exploitation), the need for serious land reform, the currently soaring cost of living and foreign policy. Its leaders know that they still have to show that they can arouse the sullen, slumbering masses of Anatolia, but they plan to continue their efforts — with the building of a nation-wide organization—to bring Turkey into the 20th century before the century ends.

The emergence of a Left movement in Turkey was inevitable. By his remarkable "revolution in stages" Ataturk intended in the first place to solidify his control of the minuscule, educated upper class in order to insure its support of his drastic Westernization policies and to put off to a later period— "eventually" — effective improvement of the lot or status of the submerged, illiterate masses.

In fact, Ataturk died before the first stage was completed, and his successors have barely paid lip service to the second. Turkey's two largest parties, different sides of the same coin, are both controlled by vested interests. Consequently there has been little evidence of a genuine intent to develop far-reaching, long-range programs of economic and social innovation.

The educated minority is small and the great majority is virtually illiterate. Having won so handily on a program of traditionalism (taking full advantage of the education gap), the Justice Party cannot move easily toward progressive modernity. And having been backed so lavishly by the landowners, the financial, industrial and business interests, it cannot (even if it wanted) turn against them.

Thus it is the election campaign itself, rather than the results, that suggests the beginning of a change in the thinking of Turkey's educated elite. There was, after almost four decades, a debate between Left and Right. In arguing about land reform, private versus state enterprise, welfare problems, foreign investment and oil policies, the voice of the Left has once more been heard in the land. Unless it is again suppressed, it will continue to gain intellectual, middle-class and professional support. It will begin to be taken up by the workers. But all this is a portent of things to come; Turkey today is far from the distinct polarization between Left and Right that prevails in most developing countries and is implicit in many modern industrial societies. Only time will tell how many Turkish leftists — frustrated by the glacial pace of worker-peasant response to their appeals—will retain the pledge to democracy which they now profess; how many will secretly swing toward revolution.

The landslide victory of the Justice Party does not, however, necessarily augur a period of stability, as believed by some wishful-thinking American officials who are too easily satisfied by the party's seeming close adherence to U.S. touchstones: NATO, CENTO, anti-radicalism, the defense and further encouragement of foreign (American) investment. Unrest, though largely inarticulate, is widespread, and eventual upheaval is not out of the question. For the present, the vested interests have been able to turn the people's attention away from the lack of economic and social progress to focus on the "injustice" done to Turkey by the Western powers, and particularly the United States, in the Cyprus affair.

This deliberately fomented anti-Americanism (originally instigated by the two major parties) was brought to the surface by the Workers' Party during the election campaign. But that party hardly deserves blame for the unpretty, wholesale anti-U.S. bias now prevalent in Turkey. Cyprus would not have been a "national issue" had not Turkish officialdom (and the vested interests) wanted it to be—for the usual and obvious reasons. But having fanned the flames without considering the consequences, they then had to place the blame on a handy scapegoat—the United States (as did the governments of Greece).

The self-induced Turkish "emotional disillusionment over Cyprus" has been exacerbated further by unscrupulous Levantine designation—even by secularists—of American companies operating in Turkey as "the big Christian firms." Finally, this overused "emotional disillusionment" is the excuse for making advances to the Soviet Union. But surely, Turkey will not kick $4.5 billion of U.S. aid in the teeth; the new Justice Party government is not at all likely to snap any of the nation's Western commitments. It is historically understandable that Turkey should start looking in other directions, but unofficially basing its current rapprochement with Russia on "emotional disillusionment" with the United States over a picayune and manufactured "issue" is more or less blackmail.

Nonetheless, Turkey is now cautiously feeling out paths similar to those taken by its southern neighbor Iran, and by Pakistan. This amounts to experimenting with a semblance of the currently fashionable coexistence trend, winning greater "independence" from the West, and getting on more familiar terms with the Afro-Asian world. (Turkey has managed to be recognized as both a European and

Savage Discovery: The Moynihan Report

William Rya

The Labor Department publication, The Negro Family (usually called "The Moynihan Report" in reference to its presumed chief author), has had an enormous impact on public discussion about the Negro in America. It contains frightening statistics about broken Negro families, illegitimate Negro children and Negro welfare recipients, and these have been seized on by journalists who proclaim in loud voices what the Moynihan Report states very quietly: Negro family instability is a basic cause of the Negro inequality and "pathology" that are reflected in unemployment statistics, census data and the results of sociological research.

In view of this influence, it is important to make public the serious shortcomings of the report that a careful analysis uncovers. Briefly, it draws dangerously inexact conclusions from weak and insufficient data; encourages (no doubt unintentionally) a new form of subtle racism that might be termed "Savage Discovery," and seduces the reader into believing that it is r racism and discrimination but t weaknesses and defects of the N

present status of inequality betwe

wareness either of its deficiencies r, more important, of the exist-nce of other well-known or well-stimated data within whose con-xt this material must be con-idered. The outstanding example f this failure is a highly sopho-oric treatment of illegitimacy.

Illegitimacy looms large in he Moynihan Report, in the text nd in the illustrations. Only 4 per ent of the relatively dull tables ut fully 22 per cent of the large nd dramatic charts and graphs oncern illegitimacy, which shines hrough the report as the prime ndex of "family breakdown." This s one of the main beams in the ypothetical structure being put to-ether. In an oversimplified way, he implicit hypothesis goes like his: the values of Negro culture produced by centuries of slavery nd mistreatment, to be sure) are uch that there is little commit-nent to the main components of amily organization — legitimacy, naterial stability, etc. The implicit oint is that Negroes tolerate prom-scuity, illegitimacy, one-parent amilies, welfare dependency, and verything else that is supposed to ollow.

The authors of The Negro Family take at face value Census Bureau statistics that record illegitimacy rates for whites at about 3 per cent, for Negroes at about 22 per cent. More careful consideration, in the context of other well-known facts, would reveal not so much a careless acceptance by Negroes of promiscuity and illegitimacy, as a systematic inequality of access to a variety of services and information.

If we do not attribute the 7-to-1 difference in illegitimacy rates to Negro family instability as a subcultural trait, what does account for these differences? Here, very briefly, are a few pieces of additional data:

Reporting. Illegitimate births are significantly underreported, and are more underreported for whites than for nonwhites. This is true, first, because reporting is dependent upon discriminatory white sources. Second, white illegitimate births occur more often in private hospitals, are attended by sympathetic—and white—doctors, and involve the cooperation of social agencies, all of which work consciously to help the white unmarried mother conceal the fact of illegitimacy.

Shotgun marriages. A large portion of first-born children are conceived "illegitimately," with the parents marrying before the child's birth. Such marriages are less frequent among Negroes because of the man's financial insecurity.

Abortion. It is estimated that more than 1 million illegal and unreported induced abortions are performed each year. Authorities agree that one-fourth to one-half of these are performed for unmarried women, and that the overwhelming majority of abortion patients are white. Abortions alone account for most of the differences in the census illegitimacy figures.

An attempt to calculate the "illegitimate conception" rates — an awkward but interesting term — would probably show that for whites it would be 12-15 per cent, for Negroes 25-30 per cent. The differences are clearly not so striking: the ratio drops from 7 to 1 to 2 to 1.

Contraception. Access to contraceptive information and services is also unequally distributed in favor of whites. The extent of inequality is not known, but if the differential were as low as 2 to 1 in favor of whites, we would be able to conclude that "illegitimate intercourse" —if we may push the terminology this far—is about the same among Negroes and whites.

In any case, it is not necessary to introduce a complex and highly speculative hypothesis about the malformation of the Negro family by slavery and post-Reconstruction semi-slavery—that is, the sins of our grandfathers. The facts are more easily explained as the results of straightforward discrimination—that is, the sins of ourselves and our contemporaries.

Aid for Dependent Children and Adoption. When they wring their hands about Negro family life, the journalists who have seized on the Moynihan Report are most fascinated with illegitimacy, but their next favorite is its presumed consequence: the number of Negro mothers receiving AFDC support. How, we may ask, does a Negro mother with an illegitimate child "get on" AFDC? First, of course, she must decide to keep the child; how does she make this decision? The answer is remarkably simple: she is rarely called on to make the choice. The services of adoption agencies and maternity homes are mostly for white mothers, who account for about 90 per cent of agency adoptions of illegitimate children, and probably an even higher proportion of independent adoptions. Again to oversimplify: white illegitimate babies get adopted, their Negro counterparts "go on" AFDC. And again we are faced with contemporary discrimination — our sins, not the sins of our grandparents.

To summarize, the reported rates of illegitimacy among Negroes and whites tell us nothing at all about differences in family structure, historical forces, instability, or anything else about which the authors speculate. From the known data, we can conclude only that Negro and white girls probably engage in premarital intercourse in about the same proportions, but that the white girl more often takes Enovid or uses a diaphragm; if she gets pregnant, she more often obtains an abortion; if she has the baby, first she is more often able to conceal it and, second, she has an infinitely greater opportunity to give it up for adoption.

The treatment of illegitimacy data in the Moynihan Report is one example of inexpert methodology. A more general defect is the subtly irrational presentation of correlational data to imply a cause-and-effect relationship. The method of argument is, first, to present data about "family breakdown" among Negroes — separation, illegitimacy, broken homes, female household heads, etc.—and then to juxtapose statistics about the "tangle of pathology" among Negroes. In the manner of a propaganda document, the report allows the reader to make the cause-and-effect connection on the basis of his own prejudice. Little or no actual cause-and-effect data is presented.

Of the total of 125 different blocks of information presented—forty-seven tables, eighteen charts and sixty pieces of data in the text—more than 80 per cent is purely descriptive, retailing stale and well-known sociological facts. Only nine pieces of information (a scant 7 per cent of the total) relate to the conclusions drawn by the authors. Of these nine, six are reports of studies showing a relationship between broken homes and delinquency, and one is drawn from the 1960 census to show that children with both parents present in the home are—not unsurprisingly—less likely to drop out of school. The final two pieces of evidence show that the tested IQs of children with fathers in the home are higher than those without fathers in the home.

This is the sum total of evidence from which the authors draw such sweeping conclusions as: > the deterioration of the Negro family. It is the fundamental source of weakness of the Negro community at the present time.

> At the heart of the deterioration of the fabric of Negro society is

> Unless this damage [the deterioration of the Negro family] is repaired, all the effort to end discrimination and poverty and injustice will come to little.
> Three centuries of injustice have brought about deep-seated structural distortions in the life of the Negro American. . . . The cycle can be broken only if these distortions are set right. In a word, a national effort toward the problems of Negro Americans must be directed toward the question of family structure.

Confronted with such enormous conclusions based on such tiny scraps of evidence, an uncharitable response would be "irresponsible nonsense!"; the most charitable possible verdict would be "not proved."

Of the other thirteen pieces of data in which evidence of relationships is presented, two are somewhat tangential, showing that poor people have larger families than rich people, a fact that has not heretofore been very well concealed. The other eleven show relationships between: unemployment and broken families, unemployment and illegitimacy, income level and illegitimacy, and unemployment and public assistance under the AFDC program. These, too, are well-known relationships and anyone with a tolerable command of social statistics could add a whole set of additional correlations: unemployment and infant mortality; income level and dilapidated housing; broken families and number of tuberculosis cases, etc., etc. What these cool correlations mean, when translated from census data to the lives of human beings, is that poor people tend to live in slums, to be oppressed and exploited and mistreated, and to experience enormous amounts of social, economic, mental and physical suffering as a result. A disproportionate share of the poor are Negro and they experience a vastly disproportionate share of this suffering. It would be far more reasonable to conclude not that "family instability" leads to a "tangle of pathology" but that poor Negro families—that is, half of all Negro families—are bitterly discriminated against and exploited with the result that the individual the family and the community ar all deeply injured.

It is not possible to comment on this smug document with out pointing out a few errors o fact. The first—"conditions in Harlem are not worse, they are probably better than in most Negr ghettos"—is followed, predictably by data about high illegitimac rates in Harlem to suggest apparently that even in Harlem, the ver paradise of ghettos, the Negro family is falling apart.

Another stupefying statement i the report is: "It is probable that at present, a majority of the crime against the person, such as rape murder, and aggravated assault, ar committed by Negroes." To suppor this statement the authors quot arrest and conviction rates, which are notoriously different from rate of crimes committed. It is wel known that Negroes—guilty and innocent alike—are more readily arrested, and convicted, than whites To conclude from the data offere that Negroes commit the majorit of significant crimes is an inep piece of interpretation.

Another fantastic error deserve to be quoted: "The white family ha achieved a high degree of stabilit and is maintaining that stability By contrast, the family structure c lower class Negroes . . . is approaching complete breakdown Such a statement reflects a doubl standard: if we were to use the authors' indices of family stabilit principally divorce and illegitimac we should have to say that bot white and Negro families—American families in general — ar "crumbling." White divorce rate have zoomed almost 800 per cen in less than 100 years and whit illegitimacy has increased mor than 50 per cent in the last twenty-five years — a rate of increas greater than that of Negroes.

What we are confronted with, i fact, is another example of the authors' ineptness—the careless tyin together of such vague concepts a "family stability" with a few specific measures of family composition. No sophisticated social scientist would rest a broad concept o such crude and simplistic measures. That the family is an extremely complex institution is a

, singles out the "unstable Negro nily" as the cause of Negro in-ality. But the statistics, as has n suggested, reflect current ef-ts of contemporaneous discrimiion. They are results, not causes.

The new ideology, accepted now n by some liberals, would make seem that unemployment, poor ucation and slum conditions ret from family breakdown, "cul-al deprivation," and lack of "acturation" of Southern rural mints.

To sustain this ideology, it is essary to engage in the popular w sport of Savage Discovery and, fit the theory, savages are being covered in great profusion in the rthern ghetto. The all-time fa-ite "savage" is the promiscuous ther who produces a litter of illegitimate brats in order to profit from AFDC. Other triumphs of savage discovery are the child who cannot read because, it is said, his parents never talk to him, and the "untenantable" Negro family (apparently a neologism for "unbearble") that is reputed to throw garbage out the window.

If we are to believe the new ideologues, we must conclude that segregation and discrimination are not the terrible villains we thought they were. Rather, we are told the Negro's condition is due to his "pathology," his values, the way he lives, the kind of family life he leads. The major qualification—the bow to egalitarianism—is that these conditions are said to grow out of the Negro's history of being enslaved and oppressed—generations ago.

It is all an ingenious way of "copping a plea." As the murderer pleads guilty to manslaughter to avoid a conviction that might lead to his being electrocuted, liberal America today is pleading guilty to the savagery and oppression against the Negro that happened 100 years ago, in order to escape trial for the crimes of today.

The theme is: "The Negro was not initially born inferior, he has been made inferior by generations of harsh treatment." Thus we continue to assert that the Negro is inferior, while chastely maintaining that all men are equal. It is all rather painful, as well as fallacious. For the fact is that the Negro child learns less not because his mother doesn't subscribe to The Reader's Digest and doesn't give him colored crayons for his third birthday, but because he is miseducated in segregated slum schools.

The Negro is more often unemployed because he is last hired and first fired—not because his mother preferred a succession of temporary lovers to a permanent husband. Whenever we move toward full employment, the Negro is employed, usually, of course, at the bottom of the status ladder. When workers are needed badly enough, the supposed lack of skills of the Negro suddenly becomes less inhibiting. This was shown during the war, when it was more important to have someone operating the lathe, even if Negro, than it was to preserve the myth of Negro inability.

And the squalor of the Negro family's home in the Northern slum requires no farfetched explanations about Southern rural background. In the first place, most of these families are not recently from the South and few are rural. In the second place, the condition of the housing is more easily explained by the neglect of slum landlords, and the crowding caused by the criminal shortage of decent low-income housing.

It is tempting, when faced with a complex problem, to wallow in the very chaos of complexity rather than to begin the task of unraveling and analyzing and, ultimately, of acting. It is obviously true that the Negro suffers from a never-ending cycle of oppression not only from generation to generation but, in the case of many individuals, from medically uncared-for birth to premature death. Each condition has its labyrinth of causation, and we soon discover that the Negro family of six in the three-room apartment has been placed there not only by the greedy slumlord and the barbarous realtor but also and equally by the venal housing inspector, and even by the noble woman leagued with her sisters in voting for a "progressive" zoning ordinance in her trim suburban town.

But to move from the recognition of infernal complexity to the refuge of damnably inaccurate simplicity is surely heresy. Much has to be done. All of it is difficult, tangled and anxious-making. Still it must be done; there's no escape in the world of sociological fakery.

Time after time, the Negro has had to deny in action the myths and lies that have been constructed to soothe the conscience of his oppressor. He had to deny his supposed docility, first by hopeless revolts against his slave-master, and then by fighting in blue uniforms by the hundreds of thousands; his lack of interest in education by almost magically expanding the few dollars he could lay hands on to send his sons through high school and his granddaughters to graduate school. He had to deny the myth of apathy both by the organized brilliance of a Woodlawn organization in Chicago and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party in Mississippi, and by the unorganized bursts of blind energy that we called riots in Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Harlem and Rochester.

If we persist in creating a new set of myths to justify the status quo, calling on the sociologists and their friends to give us the ammunition of "family disorganization" and "cultural deprivation," the Negro will doubtless destroy these too. But when we've started to move toward ending the myths that have bound us so long, to end the racism that has truly caused a "breakdown" in our community and our nation, why turn back?

Obviously, if we stop discriminating tomorrow, great damage will remain—damage ranging from miseducation that is at best partly reversible, to hatred and bitterness that may be unalterable. This damage calls for correction and compensation. But we must be clear what we mean by "compensatory programs" and we must face directly what we are compensating for. Compensation should mean that we give back what we took away. For the millions of grown and half-grown Negro Americans who have already been damaged, we must make up for the injury that we did to them. This is what we must compensate for; not for some supposed inherent or acquired inferiority or weakness or instability of the victim whom we injured.

What, then, is to be done? The young Negro man who dropped out of school or, worse, graduated from high school with a seventh-grade education, represents a specific example of damage done—in his lifetime, in our lifetime. The damage must be corrected to the greatest extent possible, by re-education, by training, by any means that come necessary. If a result of demoralizing experience of g ing up Negro is that a man not in fact have the skills to ob

the major causes of the condit which the Moynihan Report so e

Richard F. Hamilt

What will the Great Society look like? What are its likely characteristics? What, to quote President Johnson, who in turn was quoting Paul Goodman, will be the quality of life? Domestically, the two major aims of the Great Society are the end of want and the end to formal and informal inequalities of opportunity. It is striving for the realization of liberal goals, not just, as in the past, to make ad hoc responses to the more grievous problems as they arose. In this respect, the Great Society would break with most of the previous history of the world, a history in which want and inequality have been the dominant events.

There are no technical impediments to successful accomplishment of this resolve. Some West European countries have, in fact, already done away with poverty and slums. Want could be eliminated from this country right now with transfer payments of roughly $10 billion. A more adequate solution, one reducing the need for such payments by going to the roots of the poverty problem, is possible within a relatively short period.

But though the technical means for achieving the Great Society are available, the context in which any change will occur is one which may make success very difficult. The fact that both goals—the end of want and of unequal opportunity—are high on the scale of values of most Americans (or, at least, are central to their interests) means that the party in charge of this transformation will have an overwhelming edge over any opposition. Where that opposition, as with the Republicans, is a minority to begin with and split into factions, one of which is obtuse, shortsighted and intransigent, the advantage will be that much more decisive.

The opposition is in a hopeless plight. The conservative Republicans cannot win under any circumstances. On the other hand, a Republican program that presented a serious challenge to the Great Society party would permanently alienate the obtuse intransigents, whereas a compromise agreeable to both factions would never attract a majority of the electorate. Thus split, the moderate Republicans would begin the campaign with only about one-fourth of the electorate behind them. It would an extraordinary set of condit

The newly integrated ublicans attend to finance, dese and foreign affairs for the at Society party, leaving dostic welfare as the exclusive vince of the Democrats.

n the legislative field the sheer of the Democratic electorate, ether with the end of malaptionment, means a "corrected" ority status for the Republicans the Congress. In Senate and use they are fragmented and the first time in many years, elessly outmaneuvered. Here the opposition is being conted, with Senator Dirksen "comaround" in much the same way t Johnson did under Eisenhower. Democratic legislative ranks now making some first moves the direction of a "disciplined" ty on the European parliameny model. It is unlikely that the sident Democrats from the South l be able to withstand the imt of the "other half" of the uthern electorate, who will now voting for the first time; these ig remnants must either cont to Great Society politics or go der.

All these developments—the eral preferences of the electorate, breakup of the elite monolith, conversion of the overtly politimass media, and the merger the elite level—mean that Amern politics is coming to be domied by one huge centrist party. is withering away of serious itical opposition, this depluralizan of public life, poses the fundantal problem for the Great Soty.

At one time, the "me tooism" of Republican Party steadily pushthe Democrats in a more liberal ection. With every claim of "yes, now agree, only we can adminr it better," the Democrats were to "differentiate their product" d make a move which the Repubans could not follow. This is not say that the Republicans were only force working to change Democrats; important "encourment" over the years came also m pressure groups, protest movents and third parties. From 1932 however, the Republicans never iously competed by creating a new, more attractive, offering. They never outflanked and moved ahead of their opposition; they always followed. In their campaigns, they sternly avoided domestic liberal concerns, favoring rather not too easily assessible charges about the conduct of foreign policy and the issue of how many Communists there were in the State Department. As far as their domestic program was concerned, they were an unpresentable party. Their only national success in the last thirty years came by running a bland popular hero who could pose as all things to all people—a point which supports the present argument since people thought their liberal wants would be attended.

Democrats, in the meantime, have worked out a very satisfactory arrangement. No longer seriously troubled by a Republican threat, they are currently being prodded by the civil rights explosion, by the threat on the Left. Their response has been a series of spectacular legislative moves which will, no doubt, undercut the entire movement. Like Bryan borrowing from the Populists, the Democrats are now repeating a classic maneuver; they are stealing the issues.

In an affluent society, a liberal, welfare-oriented party can go a long way toward satisfying the wishes of its followers. Rather than preside over a drawn-out struggle between the people and the interests, as if it were an either/or game, the new style is to give both what they want and pay for it out of the returns from a stable and rapidly growing economy. In essence this is the Galbraithian solution — not to struggle over the "take" but to increase its size. Thus, the typical new figure on the political scene is the liberal demagogue —one who can cater to the masses because he is willing to pay them off and can do so without depriving the interests of what they want. He can be for civil rights, for improved housing, for urban renewal, for a poverty program, and at the same time can vote against a reduction of the depletion allowance. The Great Society synthesis overcomes that age-old problem of liberal politics: how to reward the clientele. Before affluence, the result was a long, hard and usually indecisive fight with the interests or it was capitulation. The new liberal, however, does not have to fight or switch.

A third major effort of the Great Society has been the conduct of a more aggressive foreign policy. This robs the lingering Republican opposition of its key issue. The UN dues-payment reform, the MLF controversy, the current Vietnam war and the Santo Domingo affair were all actions that generated hostility among our enemies, antipathy among the neutrals, and problems for our friends. This formidable opposition in no way deters the policy makers who, on the whole, appear immune to public opinion, foreign or domestic. The domestic opposition to Vietnam has been remarkable on the part of intellectual, religious and other groups, but it too was ignored. Although The New York Times was dubious editorially of the Southeast Asia policy, one consequence of "elite integration" is that their coverage of teach-ins stressed the "lighter side" of the activity as opposed to its content, when indeed there was any coverage at all.

In the face of even this opposition officials have called for consent as if it were somehow linked to national loyalty. There is a plea for withholding criticism, for lining up behind the President; a stress on the need for unity. The simple question here is: Why? The long-run price of unity is immobility and irresponsibility. A demand for unity is in effect a demand to remove the very checks and criticism which serve as an incentive to progress and virtue. As such, any call for consent is irresponsible. And this argument overlooks the fact that it is an authoritarian summons, alien to the democratic tradition.

One final point with respect to this description and prediction of American political events: Center parties—those which dominate the political spectrum, reaching far to the right and the left to achieve a sweeping majority—have inherent problems. Their success is based on campaigns waged under liberal banners. Hence they have a great need to perform; they have to push their liberal program. In a formally "free enterprise system," this means that they must pick up the support of wide ranges of business which will carry through the program. Among these are the construction firms that build low-cost housing, the demolition firms that profit from urban destruction preceding the renewal, the supplier firms that sell materials for the new solutions. Large numbers of entrepreneurial types have recently discovered that "there's money in poverty."

The need for performance, therefore, and the profits to be made from it, bring into the party large numbers of new decision makers, usually at influential levels, who may be described as "liberals of convenience" as opposed to the "liberals of conviction." The Center party may well have been founded with a large idealistic endowment, but its need to perform and the involvements stemming from it bring forth the opportunists.

Where idealism is characteristic of the amateur citizen (the one who loves his citizenship), the interests of the opportunists are closely linked to their full-time occupations. They can bring to bear all the technical expertise and informal connections associated with their corporations, thus hopelessly outmaneuvering the liberal whose convictions must be supported in his "spare" time.

The history of Center parties, therefore, is a tragic one. Idealists are shoved aside in favor of those leaders who are "more flexible," more able to "compromise." The party stops moving forward because progressive leaders no longer guide it. The party does not stop performing, but it performs in the interest of the opportunists. When the liberal supports low-cost public housing, he finds he gets some of it but it is shoddy, overpriced, unattractive and in poor locations. He supports it, and the Center party supports it, because it is "necessary to compromise" and, of course, even this new housing is better than the old. The liberals support urban renewal because they find the cities hideous and degrading; but the civic improvement they get is an upgrading of downtown merchants' properties and frequently a city which is worse to live in than before. They can, however, do their shopping in easily accessible, attractive stores.

The basic formal problem facing the Great Society, then, is the tendency toward depluralization, toward consensus. When one party dominates, the possibility of wheeling-dealing corruption is ever present. This is the case in any society with a dominant Center party. When liberals of convenience manage the program and there is no effective force to check or correct the course, the achievement is apt to be limited, falling far short what is both technically possi and morally desirable.

The dominance of the liberals convenience will erode even Galbraithian solution. Increasin we will be given the appearan of accomplishment rather than reality. Already we have seen anti-poverty program whose fu go for the support of upper-mid class administrators, an Appalac levels," and its enactment "proba means that there will not be other major housing bill for s eral years." This occurs at the ti when the "war babies" of twe years ago are forming families a beginning to demand housing.

Another facet of the low-qua accomplishment appears in handling of the unemploym question. The liberals in charge domestic affairs indicate that t will be satisfied with a "nonin tionary" 4 per cent unemploym level. This free gift of low-qua life compares with the fraction a per cent found in numerous W European countries. We, howe of in-and-out employment for w will be roughly 10 per cent of things, their contribution to c war politics and the national tr balance. Again there is no veh present to organize the oppositi

All this assumes that we are going to have at least an appearance of liberal accomplishment, low quality though it may be. But even this will come about only if the "needs" of foreign policy do not cut into the increased income available for domestic needs. Obviously there can be no guarantee. The current military build-up and our taking on the role of the "free world's" policeman (whether the world wants it or not) make clear the threat to domestic welfare, not to mention that of the rest of the world. Achieving a trade balance through the sale of new and used weapons (official gun running, in other words) merely escalates the size of the conflicts we will later undertake to pacify. Opposition in foreign affairs, which could check these dangerous moves, has been threatened with the state's repressive powers.

Both the quantity and quality of the possible liberal achievements are threatened. Ironically, it is the very "success" of the Great Society party, its sweeping electoral accomplishment, which makes possible the eminently desirable solutions, and at the same time gives us these problems.

Since the problem stems from the dwindling of our position, the solution appears to lie in the creation of such a force—and not just one which marches, protests and petitions. Isn't it time for a socialist or labor party in this country?

Con Edison

THE HUDSON RIVER CAPER . . . . . David Cort

After the recent power failure over the Northeastern United States, nobody needs to be reminded of the significance of electricity in this civilization. Its place in the whole ecology is most legibly and most ironically dramatized by the current story of New York City's Consolidated Edison. Even before the collapse of November 9, Con Ed had brought everybody into an act which was staged on the premise that the term public utility means that a power company may use the resources and convenience of the public for the greatest possible utility of the corporation.

This one probably began when New York City ordered the great gas and electric company to desist from its use of cheap residual fuels in its city power plants by 1969, since the smoke is rich in sulphur dioxide, poisonous to man, who also wants to be conserved. This must have put Con Ed into a fixed paroxysm of schizoid fury, for its alternative power proposal was calculated to enrage the maximum number of people and inflict the maximum blight on the habitat.

Con Ed had no real problems, except lèse majesté and cost accounting. It had no practical need to visit new injuries on America. It was permitted to go on poisoning New Yorkers until 1969. (The great black plumes of smoke — which seem to have grown blacker lately — ought properly to terrify the citizens but do not trouble Con Ed, whose officers live in the suburbs.) It could have gone to gas turbines, and had already begun using atomic power. But the key to its situation is that the range of economical transport of electricity has recently been extended from 300 miles to 1,500 miles.

The bothersome characteristic of electricity is that it must be used on the instant it is created; it cannot be stored. But power demands vary widely during any twenty-four hours. Thus in New York City, at 5 A.M., 1,600,000 kilowatts are used; at 9 A.M. 4,200,000 kilowatts, and production must be scaled accordingly. But at a range of 1,500 miles, a power grid embraces two time zones, and peak loads can be leveled out over the area.

Naturally Con Ed knows all this; the whole Establishment knows it. Since government owns a great deal of power in the electrical sense, the biggest business decided, well before the last Presidential election, that a truly national grid of electrical power required big business to go along with big government (Goldwater was doomed, even before he opened his mouth) Con Ed has access to electricity from New England to Appalachia by interconnections already set up or about to be set up.

So what Con Ed now proposed to the Federal Power Commission was that it really ought to go just 50 miles up the Hudson River, to the northern entrance to the superb Hudson Highlands, and disembowel Storm King Mountain. True, it had a cute idea. During the early morning hours, when New York demand was slack, its city-generated power would be used to pump Hudson water up a 2-mile, 40-foot-wide tunnel to a reservoir between Misery and White Horse peaks. Then, when the rush load came at 9 A.M., the water would run back down again, generating power to meet the high demand. The New York City generators would contribute three kilowatt hours for every two kilowatt hours produced by the runback. Thus the total sulphur-dioxide exhaust spewed on the city would increase, not decrease, but nobody would notice the plumes of sulphurous smoke in the pre-dawn hours.

But there were other ominous side effects of the proposed plant. Con Ed would have to buy Cornwall's main reservoir (a fine source of good water) and flood it nightly with polluted river water. Cornwall would therefore have to tap New York's hard-pressed Catskill Aqueduct. Until recently, no New York community had the right to sell its water supply and Cornwall could not have been bullied into doing so by the Federal Power Commission. But in 1963, Governor Rockefeller had hurried through a bill permitting such sales. Only Cornwall has used the privilege.

Not far upriver is the proposed Chelsea pumping station, which is expected to save New York City from drought. It can draw usable water from the tidal, brackish Hudson only because the heavier salt water sinks, and Chelsea would skim its fresh water off the top, primarily at ebb tide. But the gigantic turbulence, twice a day, at the Storm King intake-outlet would probably stir fresh and salt together, putting Chelsea out of business.

There was a further side issue about fish (shad and striped bass) which spawn in the Hudson Highlands stretch. The sole witness (Con Ed) swore that the fish would not be endangered and that the most recent study on the subject had been made in 1938. It soon appeared that a study had been made in 1956, and the two biologists who made it said of the Con Ed witness: "He knew of our work. In fact, he hired us." And their study contradicted the testimony of the witness.

The press hates to use the word "lie." But lies are much of the substance of this story. And stories iridescent with lies hold and fascinate even the most incurious. One day somebody noticed and photographed at Indian Point a half-acre pile of dead striped bass. They had been killed by some still unexplained combination of the warm water outflow and the shore structures. Soon armed Burns guards appeared and ran off the intruders. There were later denials by the New York Conservation Department that any fish had died or any pictures been taken; and, alternatively, that Con Ed was in any way at fault for the slaughter. Had the Conservation Department admitted the existence of the pictures, it would have had to prosecute Con Ed. And so a survey, subsidized by Con Ed, of the fish situation was commenced and the Conservation Department blamed the kill, improperly, on the Atomic Energy Commission. There was no prosecution.

Thus were brought into the Con Ed caper some 400,000 Atlantic fishermen from New England to Cape May who catch the fish that spawn in this stretch of the Hudson. And that is no contemptible host.

At the Con Ed hearings before the four-man Federal Power Commission it was left delicately unclear whether the ingenious Storm King plant would produce 1,800,000, 2 million, 3 million, or even perhaps 4 million kilowatt hours. Asked whether Con Ed had fully explored interconnections with other power sources, every Con Ed witness gave "non-responsive" answers which the commissioners (with one exception) tactfully accepted.

Mortimer Borne: Public Works of Art Project

Docks on the Hudson

For the instruction of the Power Commissioners, Con Ed estimated the construction cost of the world's largest "high-head pumped storage development" at Storm King at $162 million, of which $14 million would go for overhead transmission lines cutting a ruthless 250-foot swath through the two counties just north of New York City. It barefacedly testified that the cost of putting the lines underground would be $99 million, a prohibitive figure.

This last may be the most sparkling lie in the whole affair, but it is endorsed by all utility companies everywhere. An underground line requires, not a 250-foot strip, but a narrow lane, which vastly reduces condemnation costs. This lane might not even have to be bought outright. The cost to the whole society, in damage to property values and loss of land use, would be almost nil with underground transmission, and inestimable with overhead transmission, especially through highly developed communities, as in this case. Guided by the considerations, I assert that transmission would actually be cheaper underground than overhead. But the former would deprive the utility of much of its tyrannical powers over just ordinary citizens. The clerks who run these companies like that power. In a previous confrontation, utilities have claimed that underground distribution of power costs ten times as much as overhead.

In this case, a head of slowly gathering anger was building up among ordinary citizens. A dozen organizations had begun to make harsh noises, and a new one, Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference, mobilized some money, some power and some initiative.

Probably in response to this, Rep. Richard L. Ottinger, freshman Democrat of Putnam and Westchester Counties, introduced HR 3012, a bill to create a federal Hudson Highland National Scenic Riverway, to preserve and rehabilitate the river's course, and abate water pollution. This could block Con Ed completely. Presently ten similar bills were introduced in the House, and one in the Senate by Senators Kennedy and Javits of New York. In the ensuing months, a steady stream of Congressmen sponsored Ottinger's bill.

Meanwhile, on March 9, the Federal Power Commission officially handed Storm King Mountain over to Con Ed, while remanding for further hearings the matters of the transmission routes and the methods of protecting fish at the water intakes. Three commissioners agreed. One, Charles Ross, dissented. He did not think, as the applicant semed to, that "without an immediate decision, the world is coming to an end." He thoroughly doubted Con Ed's solemn cost estimates for going underground in transmission, and pointed out that the utilities' fight against going underground anywhere, anytime, "is to them a deadly serious war. . . . When a utility doesn't wish to do something, it becomes prohibitively expensive."

Storm King in hand, Con Ed announced an alternative route for its great swath of overhead transmission lines. This turned out to threaten the property of many who had publicly opposed the project, including officers of the embattled organizations. It is perhaps coincidental, but not irrelevant.

Now a new figure belly-flopped into the river — Governor Nelson Rockefeller. First he rushed through the State Legislature a bill, signed May 28, to run an expressway right along the Hudson River shore of Hastings, Dobbs Ferry, Irvington, Tarrytown and Yonkers, with an inland spur passing Rockefeller property that had been thoughtfully rezoned for commercial use. Then, in wild paradox, he rushed through another bill to set up a Hudson Valley Scenic and Historic Corridor, much of whose values the first bill would blot out. The corridor was intended to block Ottinger's riverway. But in fact a state can do nothing to stop five existing federal agencies from doing whatever they like with the Hudson. But Ottinger's proposal could stop them.

Rockefeller injected some absolutely original thinking into the affair. Anybody who wanted to save Storm King, he said, should simply buy the mountain. The 800-foot generator plant, he said, might very well become a greater tourist attraction than the mountain itself. Perhaps rattled by the general bedlam, Rockefeller's assistant press secretary pointlessly asserted that Rockefeller had never owned any Con Ed shares. Yet Rockefeller's official statement in 1959 listed Con Ed as one of his major holdings.

Now a brochure handsome with art work appeared: it generally endorsed the Hudson River and ended with a lament for its imminent "sentence . . . to federal custody . . . parceled out to federal caretakers.' (Like a cemetery, see?) This was issued by the Rockefellers (via Brother Laurance's Hudson study commission), its only detectable point being to emphasize the profound Rockefeller feeling for the river. One beauty of the Hudson Valley modestly not mentioned is the vast feudal Rockefeller estate at Pocantico Hills, where whole villages are tenanted by Rockefeller retainers and the public highways run between miles of high-wire Rockefeller fences.

The mounting uproar took visible form when public hearings on Ottinger's bill were held in the Hudson Valley towns, before the National Parks and Recreation Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, July 24 and 25. The crowd at North Tarrytown, for example, was estimated at 600.

The Congressmen soon got the idea that these people, though well mannered, were in earnest. They cheered and booed. The testimony was revealing. Politicians from industrial towns like Newburgh and Yonkers, whose shores were already ruined, were in favor of "further study," a euphemism for opposition to Ottinger's bill. Towns hoping for power installations (Storm King would increase the locality's tax rolls ten times) were also opposed. Rockefeller's man, Conrad Wirth, was curiously plaintive in opposition. Of course everybody was the Hudson River's best friend. But some of the pressure groups had the insolence to describe conservationists, who are simple patriots, as just another pressure group. It is a dark day when we must count patriots as one small factor in a large equation of greedy pressures.

Each time a witness attacked Rockefeller and his riverside expressway, the crowd--in a strongly Republican area—gave thunderous and prolonged applause. Several witnesses said the highway belonged inland along Saw Mill River Road (9A), partly adjoining the Rockefeller estates. On a hot Sunday morning, the Congressional committee was given a short tour of the river, found its broad bosom strewn with sewage, debris and detergent foam, and passed Newburgh's gaping sewer mouth. Thus the once beautiful but still noble river.

What the Hudson River caper had tied together were the hitherto unrelated factors of air pollution, electric power, scenery and recreation, water pollution, water for people, water for fish, federal agencies, strontium radiation, local politicians and underground versus overhead transmission lines.

Starting back from this snake pit, Congressman Ottinger introduced some more legislation. A three-bill package, supported September 9 by Sen. Maurine Neuberger of Oregon and others, set out to encourage the utilities to develop underground transmission. Another bill asked for a study of the fish and wild-life resources of the nation. A third would restrict the Secretary of the Interior in disposing of wild-life refuges.

Nor were the ordinary citizens idle. The Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference filed with the Federal Power Commission a motion of Stay of Opinion and Order Issuing License. It has taken an appeal against the FPC order into the New York federal courts. The Cornwall Taxpayers' Water Protection Association has begun proceedings in Orange County to force Con Ed to return all land already taken over, and to stop acquiring any more.

On September 2, a four-month survey of the Hudson River, to be conducted by four federal departments, was announced. And all this tangled plot was set in motion by Con Ed.

But if any impression has been given that Con Ed does not truly, in its way, love the people, this must be corrected at once. In its public relations booklet, enclosed with gas and light bills, it tells us that it employs a man with binoculars at the top of the Empire State Building to scan the horizon for nasty smoke from Con Ed power stacks. "Air pollution control is serious business at Con Edison." (So serious that Con Ed is regularly fined by the city.) At night, presumably, the man with the binoculars goes home. Public relations never go on in the dark. The night is for real.

Slave South: Beyond Economics

Aileen S. Kraditor

Engels, complaining about distortion of his and Marx's views, once wrote:

> The determining element in history is ultimately the production and reproduction of real life. More than this neither Marx nor I have ever asserted. Hence if somebody twists this into saying that the economic element is the only determining one, he transforms that proposition into a meaningless, abstract, senseless phrase. The economic situation is the basis, but the various elements of the superstructure . . . also exercise their influence upon the course of the historical struggles and in many cases preponderate in determining their form. . . . Without making oneself ridiculous it would be a difficult thing to explain in terms of economics the existence of every small state in Germany. . . . (Engels to Bloch, Sept. 21-22, 1890)

Engels complained in vain. Sixty-two years later, Eric Goldman wrote that Karl Marx "prided himself on the rigidly scientific nature of his economic determinism" (Rendezvous with Destiny). When respected scholars make such statements, is it to be wondered that most American readers of history take it for granted that Marxism and economic determinism are the same or at least compatible? It is easy to expose the absurdity of such assumptions; one need merely quote Marx or Engels against their interpreters. One can, in addition, show how economic determinism fails to answer important questions or creates insoluble problems for the historian who tries to apply it to historical data. But showing Marxism and economic determinism to be antithetical and economic determinism to be an invalid theory is one thing; showing Marxism to be a useful tool for historical analysis is another. Herein, quite aside from Genovese's contribution to our knowledge of the facts concerning the slave South, is the enormous value of this collection of essays.

Why is it entitled The Political Economy of Slavery and not The Economics of Slavery? Because as a Marxist, as distinguished from an economic determinist, Genovese does not believe the slave South can be "explained" in terms of economic elements alone. Slavery was not only an economic institution, a special way of exploiting workers for a profit. In addition, slavery was the foundation of a complex social edifice; it created, in Genovese's words, "a class of slaveholders with a special ideology and psychology and the political and economic power to impose their values on society as a whole," a class that increasingly came to see slavery "as the essence of morality in human relationships. Under the circumstances the social conflict between North and South took the form of a moral conflict." The slaveholders' "pride, sense of honor, and commitment to their way of life made a final struggle so probable that we may safely call it inevitable without implying a mechanistic determinism against which man cannot avail."

This interpretation contrasts with the two most popular theories of the causes of the Civil War. One school argues that slavery was nothing more than a special form of capitalist exploitation of labor, that Southern capitalism clashed with Northern capitalism over domination of the new West and of the federal government, and that war was inevitable in the sense that it was the choice of no individual or group but determined by the irreconcilability of the economic interests of the two capitalist classes. The other major school points to conflicts of economic interest in other places and at other times, conflicts that did not result in war, and argues that such clashes were not fundamental enough to bring the two sections to blows, that on the contrary there were no real conflicts that could not have been resolved by reasonable men, and that therefore war was caused by the tragically enormous influence of demagogues seeking power and fanatics seeking perfection. The first view sees the economic conflict as the

A spider is sewing the silence;
He stitches up my shabby loneliness.
In the world I would not have seen you,
but here I greet you, fellow of my solitude.

First living thing I've seen for months!
I can talk to you!
Please look on me as a gigantic fly. Believe
I am caught in your web.

Suck my blood! What do I care?
I know. I know it is agony to be hungry. But this is dinner for me — to be able to give myself to you.

See, slowly they appear through the air
Poison spiders with two legs.
When they bite me with the hate in their eyes, or choke me in their iron snares,

I let them. Ejaculate all your poison!
A weight of fluid now protects me, and the beauty in my heart moves toward the sun
though I am trapped by webs of stone.

l" one; the second sees the psy- logical conflict as the "real" one. ovese, accepting both as "real," ues that there was an economic t of the Southern expansionism t precipitated war; but there were itical, social and psychological ts, too:

> Each supported and fed the tap- ot—the exigencies of slaveholder egemony in a South that fought ainst comparative disadvantages the world market and that found self increasingly isolated morally nd politically. From another point f view, each was a manifestation f those exigencies. Although some ppear to be objective, or matters f social process, whereas others ppear to be subjective, or matters f psychological reaction to pos- bly imaginary dangers, the differ- nce becomes unimportant when ach is related to the fundamental osition of the slaveholders in outhern society.

The narrowly economic interpreta- n has taken a number of forms in e past fifty years, and it has em- asized a number of different his- rical problems. One very old bone contention among scholars is the estion whether slavery was profit- le to the slaveholders, and Geno- se criticizes in detail the most im- rtant recent contribution to the ntroversy, an article by Alfred H. onrad and John R. Meyer, first pub- shed in 1958. The question of slav- y's profitability is of course a legiti- ate and important one for historians ho wish to understand the slave outh. What makes the article espe- ally relevant here is that, as Gen- vese says, "the most sweeping so- al and political questions have been ought to be hanging on the calcula- on of profit and loss." His criticism, must be said, is devastating, as to onrad and Meyer's method as well s to the conclusions they draw from heir study. In regard to method, for xample, he notes that in calculat- ng capital costs, they include "the nitial cost of work animals and as- ume that they were thereafter self- eproducing," despite the fact that, s Genovese notes, "the great bulk of he work animals consisted of mules nd oxen"! Less entertaining but more ignificant, perhaps, is Genovese's udgment that one cannot understand what was happening by making the planters' ledgers (even correctly in- erpreted) the principal primary source. He points out that a finding that slavery was profitable can be made a starting point for a theory that the Civil War was either a repressible or an irrepressible conflict; and a theory that slavery was unprofitable can also lead to either of those conclusions. "Great social transformations do not come about as a result of a kind of popular income accounting; . . . an ideological and psychological assessment of the Southern slaveholders is essential to an understanding of Southern political economy."

Poetry Editor

The editors are happy to announce that Michael Goldman has been appointed poetry editor for The Nation. Himself a poet whose work has appeared in The Atlantic Monthly, The Kenyon Review, The Virginia Quarterly Review, The New Yorker and elsewhere, Mr. Goldman teaches in the Department of English and Comparative Literature at Columbia University. His First Poems was published last summer by Macmillan.

Denise Levertov, to whom the magazine owes a great debt for the excellence of the poetry that was published under her editorship, has resigned her post with us in order to gain more time for her own writing.

That assessment is an integral part of the detailed analysis, from the author's own Marxist standpoint, of the Southern political economy that takes up the bulk of this book. The essays were written at different times, and each of them can stand by itself. The first offers a general interpretation of the slave South; each of the others explores a different subsidiary topic. The chief points may be summarized (and vastly oversimplified) as follows:

Frontier farmers in both North and South used the soil in wasteful ways, but the effects of soil exhaustion were overcome in the North by crop diversification and other changes once the frontier stage was past. In the South, soil exhaustion continued to be a problem for reasons that can only be hinted at here: slavery perpetuated a one-crop system that prevented sufficient rotation; it fostered an aristocratic attitude and a propensity to consume (on the part of the planters) that discouraged the accumulation of enough liquid capital to purchase fertilizers on a large scale; it forced planters to use poor quality farm implements; it kept down the number of farm animals and therefore the availability of manure. Reformers like Edmund Ruffin agitated for scientific methods, but most planters were unwilling and usually financially unable to adopt them.

The author argues that in the upper South, wholesale reform would have, ultimately, been introduced only at the expense of the slave system itself. To raise the money to buy fertilizers a Virginia planter would have had to sell many slaves. Crop rotation as a means of replenishing the worn-out soil would have meant diversification, which in turn would have required an urban market for a variety of foodstuffs. Slavery discouraged urbanization because it discouraged industrialization. Therefore the potential market for the foodstuffs grown on the scientifically managed farms in the border states would have had to be in the North. The border states would thus have become increasingly a part of the free-state economy, a process that would have been accelerated by the sale of surplus slaves to the lower South. Agricultural reform in the upper South depended on the existence of a market for its slaves, a market that could continue to exist only if other parts of the South continued to use the very methods that made the reform necessary. Hence, he concludes, "a general reformation of Southern agriculture could not take place while slavery was retained."

Why couldn't urban markets develop in the South? Because, replies Genovese, large-scale urbanization can come about only where an agrarian revolution takes place, creating diversified farming and livestock-raising to feed the cities, and introducing efficient methods that reduce the number of laborers on the countryside, forcing the surplus rural population into urban industry. The city dwellers become the consumers of the food grown on the farms and the producers of the agricultural implements, textiles and other commodities needed on the farms. The bulk of the ante-bellum Southern population consisted of slaves and whites too poor to be an adequate market on which a Southern industrialization could be built.

One might ask why the leaders of the South did not see their long-range interest in ending slavery and building a progressive capitalist economy with free labor. If economic interest alone were sufficient motivation, this question would be unanswerable. The point is that slavery was more than an economic institution. It was the basis for a civilization. It produced, says the author, a master class with anti-capitalist values, a class that > recoiled at the notions that profit should be the goal of life; . . . that thrift and hard work should be the great virtues; and that the test of the wholesomeness of a community should be the vigor with which its citizens expand the economy. . . . The aristocratic spirit of the planters [who set the tone for the whole society] absorbed acquisitiveness and directed it into channels that were socially desirable to a slave society: the accumulation of slaves and land and the achievement of military and political honors. . . . Slavery established the basis of the planter's position and power. It measured his affluence, marked his status, and supplied leisure for social graces and aristocratic duties.

And it thus could foster behavior, on the part of the planters, sometimes directly contrary to their long-range economic interests.

Aside from purely financial reasons, therefore, the Southern ruling class, with individual exceptions, would not have subscribed to a program to end slavery gradually, replace it with free labor, and build a South of commercial farms and flourishing industries. To have done so would have been to condemn their entire way of life. Genovese believes that their only alternative was to continue to expand their system into new lands to replace the worn-out soil of the older South and to provide markets for the surplus slaves of t seaboard states. Even where the n territory was unsuited to plantati agriculture, the slave owners could have agreed to containment with implicitly agreeing that slavery w evil, rather than the foundation the finest civilization in the wor When the North prevented furtl extension of slavery, the plant quite rationally (from their sta point) decided, as Genovese puts "to stake everything on a desper gamble for a political independen that would have freed them to pu their system southward. . . ."

Genovese supports his analy with a wide variety of sources, incl ing planters' records, ante-bellu newspapers, treatises on agronor and studies of the problems of mc ern underdeveloped nations, ancie Rome, medieval England and coloni Latin America. He enriches his d cussion with insights drawn from t works of thinkers from Hegel a Machiavelli to Maurice Dobb a Paul Baran.

This work is a noteworthy cont bution to our understanding of t pre-Civil War South. To the exte that the author proves his thesis, also demonstrates, first, that pr posals to change one socio-econom system into another piecemeal, or elections, or by sitting around a co ference table and converting tho with a deep emotional as well political and economic stake in t old system, are visionary; and se ond, that even a "doomed" ruling cla can be capable of enormous effort and even certain successes, in i efforts to stay in power.

THE MANDELBAUM GATE. By Muriel Spark. Alfred A. Knopf. 369 pp. $5.95.

Helen Yglesias

The most unlikely candidate to suffer a problem of Jewish identity would seem to be a Muriel Spark heroine, though there were hints of this theme in her first novel in 1957. Between the subtly sketched conversion to Catholicism in The Comforters, however, and Barbara Vaughan's problem in The Mandelbaum Gate, a shift of emphasis has taken place. The intermeshed themes of Jewish identity a Catholic faith come forward sta center, and there is definite cause f alarm in this: Jewish identity has a ready reached jungle-growth propo tions in contemporary literature. Wi the introduction of half-Jews into th search, the subject threatens to sprea weedlike over the world. In the voic if not the spirit of thanksgiving, the Passover liturgy, it is high tim to intone, "It would have been suff cient!"

Mrs. Spark's new work is alarmin in other respects. It is a frighteningl greedy novel, gulping up theolog philosophy, politics, current event and fashionable gossip; a seemingl dless stream of name dropping: om the Dead Sea Scrolls to the Eichann trial; from spying for Nasser filming Lawrence of Arabia. This astonishing enough for an artist io excels in working a small area ftly and brilliantly; what is more rprising is to see her structure ain and falter. Beginning with The mforters, Mrs. Spark has demonrated a construction as tight and cky and pleasing as a puzzle. The andelbaum Gate too has the conruction of a jigsaw puzzle, but inead of the last piece falling perfectly to place to our applause, it is as ough the author's elbow has been gged. All the little odd-shaped pieces iow their cracks.

The Mandelbaum Gate is named r one of the world's sore spots, the ontier crossing between Israel and rdan, so called because a Mr. Manelbaum once owned the house on the orner. It is here—since she is an Engsh half-Jew on a Catholic pilgrimge—that Barbara Vaughan's troubles egin. Some predate Jerusalem: the ilemma of Who am I?, a lover she ill not marry unless Rome clears his ivorce, and a jealous woman friend n London who does not want her to narry at all. Having entered Jerusaem, poor Barbara is embroiled with ushy Israeli guides and subtle Arab nerchants; she encounters British forign service officers, pimps, advenurers and blue-eyed sexy Arab girls; lisguised as an old Arab woman she s rescued from a nunnery, and smuggled across the Mandelbaum Gate disguised as a nun; there are flash-backs o her Golders Green Jewish background and to her polo-tennis-and-tea English background; she catches scarlet fever; she turns up as an observer at the Eichmann trial; she has a fist fight with a woman spy for Nasser who neatly fits Sunday supplement terminology by embracing communism, Hitlerism and anti-Semitism in one trim English head; Barbara even gets to visit the Holy Shrines.

Tricks abound. Barbara disappears; Freddie loses his memory; time moves in circular repetitions; the novel's point of view wavers as if directed by a hand-held camera. In the end it is all wrapped up in single-sentence packages: "Suzi married a lawyer in Athens. . . . Abdul Ramdez and Mendel Ephraim left Israel and managed to reach Tangier, where they opened a cafe. . . . Barbara and Harry were married . . . they had one child. . . ." It is the gates of Jerusalem which claim the last paragraph, "Damascus Gate, that gate of the Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday," and the Mandelbaum Gate, "a piece of street between Jerusalem and Jerusalem." Despite the cracks, there is a pattern in the puzzle. "The city that is one day to be" remains the goal; the spur is faith, that which "gives substance to our hopes, which convinces us of things we cannot see."

Because a note at the back of the book tells us so, we know that Mrs. Spark is a convert to the Roman Catholic Church and, like her heroine, endowed "with the beautiful and dangerous gift of faith which, by definition of the Scriptures, is the sum of things hoped for and the evidence of things unseen." In the presence of these self-proclaimed wonders, we tiptoe and speak softly. They create a shield beyond which it seems ill-mannered to penetrate. Besides, these are mysteries—will they yield to critical reason?

Barbara Vaughan herself hurls reason against the mystery of her identity, but definition eludes her. "I am who I am," God's answer to Moses, she dismisses as too large. Later, when her Jewish blood is considered a danger in Jordan, she is delighted with Freddie's defense: "Jewish blood or not, the point is, it's hers and it has got to be protected." Pressed to explain why she has substituted one religion for another, she argues that Christianity is a new ordering of the Jewish religion. This is Zhivago's argument, but flatly stated, without Pasternak's poetry or passion; and without his ideological view that Jewish exclusiveness deprives the Jew of meaningful life within the mainstream of society.

Her Israeli guide, a Polish Jew who fled the Nazi occupation, makes himself disagreeable, demanding reasons for abandoning her Jewish heritage. She finds it a difficult question. "In Poland," he tells her, "the Catholic priests used to lead the pogroms." Her response is, "Well, they shouldn't have."

Although she longs to marry her lover and stay within the Church, she reaches a point where she will marry him without Rome's clearance. But a jealous friend, hoping to do harm, inadvertently puts everything right. Barbara gets her man and keeps her Church: by error, by an act of evil intent, Barbara is restored to grace. At the trial, she listens to Eichmann patiently expound "once more, the complex theology in which not his own actions, not even Hitler's, were the theme of his defense, but the honor of the Supreme Being, the system, and its least tributary Bureau IV-B-4," and adds the comment, "It was a highly religious trial." It is the Hannah Arendt view of evil, with the added twist of Mrs. Spark's irony.

The earlier Spark novels were sustained in an aura of quest for a state of human grace into which we willingly plunged with her, as if into a gay adventure: realistic detail, high comedy and religious mystery perfectly adjusted to a mechanism which opened door after door down a corridor of endless speculation. If there was something downright nasty and strange in these novels, there was also an element which soared beyond ordinary matter. The box within a box within a box of The Comforters conveyed a witty and meaningful mystery, and for all the terror of the message of the presence of death in Memento Mori, it was, on a realistic level, a brilliant destruction of the illusion that old age is a time of wisdom garnered in tranquillity and resignation. Ronald's epileptic seizure in court in The Bachelors and the judge's question, "Is this man a medium?" were marvelously funny even as the scene invited serious wonder about the power of the senses. And The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie appeals on several levels: it was a superbly realistic rendering of a group, while Sandy, clutching the bars of the nunnery, pondering betrayal, carried it far beyond its genre.

In departing from miniatures and from her playful dual approach, Muriel Spark has stumbled into difficulties. To the overwhelmingly complex social, political and human questions raging at the Gate, she has responded with a razzle-dazzle entertainment, weighted with ambiguous ironies and hovering in an atmosphere of a passion play. But she is playing it cool. She conveys no transforming experiences—holy or human. The tiring discomfort of her heroine's pilgrimage to the shrines is recorded in realistic detail, undoubtedly accurate. Of my own visit to those shrines many years ago, before the Gate but not before the problems, I remember now only Rachel's Cave and the Wailing Wall. They were disappointing: little dirty places whose significance evaded me. A greater experience was a recent visit to the Catholic shrine in northern Spain, Santiago de Compostela, upon whose famous Gloria Portico the argument of Christianity's spiritual ascendancy over Judaism is told with such open, passionate conviction, it is irresistible. Irresistible, the delightfully natural march of the granite figures of Adam and Eve, David of the crossed feet and the harp, Moses, Esther and smiling Daniel—all led to Jesus by way of St. James. Irresistible, the botafumeiro, a huge censor of flaming incense, swinging from nave to nave of the immense cathedral. Glorious artistry convinces in the first place and glorious showmanship in the second; what is missing in this novel is some of each.

Implicit in the discussion of the measuring and sorting of Barbara's blood is the fact of the extermination of the Jews. It is central to the novel's true dialogue between good and evil, finally always Mrs. Spark's compelling interest. Her approach levels and cools the debate and ends with an invitation to partake of ambivalent doubt and ambivalent faith—within the true Church or without. THE WARRIORS. By Sol Yurick. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 189 pp. $3.95.

Robert Hatch

There was a time when the gradient, up or down, from the neighborhood of letters was readily negotiable; the road was not out on the Guermantes Way and a cab would take you to the lodgings of Raskolnikov. Today you must jump, in the language of modern physics, from one "state" to the next, and since the writer is usually readier for this exploit than the reader, the two may find themselves in orbits whose expectations are not analogous. The distortion of communication can then be severe. It may seem to the reader that he has been shoved in with lunatics, forced to negotiate landscapes of skewed perspective, asked to apply himself to a metaphysics of paradox and a logic of non sequitur. The word "absurd" gets tossed around in ways not intended, and the author, who is trying to show what he has found, is praised for his fantastic invention or condemned for morbid self-indulgence. How to throw a bridge across?

Something of this must have concerned Sol Yurick when he determined to write yet another novel of the juvenile tribes that share out the territo of New York City. The problem wit this subject matter is notorious.
you tell such a story within a conte that the reader thinks is well know to him—the streets, the neighborhoo landmarks, the sounds of traffic an the neon—he may reject the behavi of your characters as irrational an state with some heat his refusal become involved in the exploits of th criminally insane. And yet except i science fiction you cannot write
New York and put subway sto where none exist or set palm tre out in Tompkins Square.

Yurick resolves this predicame with ingenuity and style. First, h proposes an initiating situation whic without being at all incredible, sufficiently removed from actualit to warn the reader that he is co fronting a known place in an u known context; then he pilots h story home along a familiar pat whose coordinates of allusion hol the chronicle within the limits moral relevance. The event that tri gers his action is an all-city congre of fighting gangs convened in Va
Cortlandt Park, to which come th warriors of the title, representative of a brotherhood in Coney Island, the edge of the mapped world. Th

:h down which Mr. Yurick runs his rrative is Xenaphon's Anabasis—: road back to Greece. He dwells :haps too insistently on this model these Negro boys are not the iltrious remnants of a professional ny; they are a tribal party, bound ;ether by magic rites, disciplined paternal authority. Nevertheless, : comparison serves excellently to stain an atmosphere of naked exsure to a world unknown in which : episodes of the novel can be acoted.

A small body of fighting men, ipped of their weapons by adverse :tune, must gain their way through succession of principalities whose stoms and prowess are unknown, t all of which are well understood be jealously defended. The deportent of these boys will not begin to ake sense until the reader accepts at they study a subway map with actly the challenged awe of a ıoenician gazing upon a chart of e waters west of Spain. Terra ingnita and they are flung down in e midst of it.

The adult community of the three roughs through which the six dropıts must journey scarcely figures in eir calculations. Men, women, non'filiated juveniles are part of the ıpersonal environment endured ike by all the named peoples; it is background unspecifically hostile ıt readily kept at bay by trained ımpaigners. Or eliminated. When man resents the warriors, they knife m to the ground in a ritual annihition; his offense was not great, but became mortal in the equation of ıeir exposed peril.

Nor do they give much thought to ıe police; they are the gods, incalılable and unappeasable, and the ıost intrepid warrior can do no more ıan avoid their gaze and flee their resence.

It is the other peoples—the other angs—that must be approached with uile, placated, overawed, outwitted. he Dominators from Coney Island, diplomatic party placed unexpected- on a war footing, must avoid battle, nd their best chance of doing so is seem as proudly truculent as game ocks. Sexuality is a crucial factor in he subtle game of face.

Yurick's journey home allows ne to see plainly what has not been vident before: these gang youths are ıot at odds with society; they move hrough society on trails cut between ettlements. Anything this surrounding jungle offers they will take (and it is as lush and poisonous as a rain forest); any threat it puts forth they will strike down. What to the reader is the Times Square IRT station is to them a lava pit of seething monstrosity; what to him is a car full of punters homeward bound from Yonkers Raceway is to them an assemblage of Titans. But what the reader sees as a group of delinquents lounging in the dim light of a store window, they recognize as the advance patrol of the Borinquen Blazers, elegant on their own turf, ruttish with machissmo, small but how dangerous?

The steady soldier; the dreamer sick with intimations of cowardice; the violent giant, half shield, half menace; the young recruit, to be blooded and sheltered—these are living anachronisms: bronze-age infantry tossed by some grotesque time trick into a 20th-century metropolis. Their native land is a half dozen square blocks, their known world 50 or so square miles, the race to which they belong a few thousand boys and girls who live the gang life. They are ignorant, superstitious, lecherous, cruel and treacherous—by society's standards. Yurick has set up the prisms that allow one to judge them by their own. It is only fair, and carries the bonus of a story that blazes through the hot city night.

FOGGY BOTTOM'S DOLCE VITA

Washington

Some 240 lawyers and lobbyists, executives of booming research and redevelopment corporations and retired major generals have put down as much as a quarter million dollars each for cooperative apartments with 90-foot balconies overlooking the Potomac. They are now beginning to move into the first unit of the Watergate, a large new apartment complex in Foggy Bottom. Architecturally this development brings Washington 1,000 miles closer to Miami Beach. Culturally, La Dolce Vita has reached the shores of the Potomac.

This has been the shrewdly accurate aim of the project's sponsors, an Italian syndicate. While it has provided some apartments in the relatively moderate price range of $35,000 to $60,000, the design and the social tone are geared to those recently arrived in the higher brackets. It has even attracted a few of the wall-to-wall set from their suburban homes.

The Societa Generale Immobiliari, a public stock company, which counts the Vatican as one of its principal shareholders, has a background of speculative apartment house buildings in Rome, and is now engaged in such jet-assisted projects as a business complex in Montreal and a satellite town outside Mexico City. SGI's chairman, Aldo Samaritani, presides over the Watergate Corporation. Hence the presence of Luigi Moretti, the Italian architect of this richly conceived development with its surprising curvilinear forms, its fountains and mar-moreal open spaces and its neo-b roque details, all so exciting in the floodlit decadence. And of course tl plush interior decor of Arturo Pini San Miniato. And the Italian manag ment—down to the last bidet.

What these gentlemen have achie ed, and what they are still achievin stands about a five-minute walk fro the State Department. One gent curving caterpillar of a building ha been completed; four others, inclu ing an office building and an apa ment hotel, are in work. The Fogg Bottom district, lying between th White House and Georgetown, ha been for some years responding the new concentration of governme employment. It has generated a su prising number of reasonably attra tive new apartment houses and th charming conversion of older ro houses on the Georgetown-Capitol Hi model. Measured now by this eno mous new development, the earli efforts seem puny and piecemeal, a though they have established a ce tral-city vernacular that is as plea ant as it is unique.

Watergate hopes to create a foc for the commercial and public li of this larger area. Its multi-lev shopping center contains both suc local services as barber and beau shops, drug and food stores, and th branch banks, restaurants, clothin shops and other enterprises design to serve the surrounding communit Residents can splash in four swim ming pools. The entire developme will contain 900 dwellings, plus th hotel and the offices; it should hav an ultimate population of about 6,00 As with most large central-city res dential developments, this is highl self-conscious "turf" with its own r stricted gardens, armed police patro and proprietary services. A fourtee camera, closed-circuit television sy tem guards all entrances.

The vast elliptical forms of th Watergate will occupy nearly a qua ter mile of river front between th site of the J. F. Kennedy Memori Arts Center and Rock Creek. It is al situated in a tangle of expressway and interchanges, the characterist curving lines of which are an evide source of the project's design. Wash ington first became aware of the po sibilities for this neglected site, lon shadowed not merely by the river miasma but by smelly gas tanks, wit the new highway locations. An am bitious, unified development progra was offered but staved off by inte d developers. Thereafter a fan- c collection of new buildings be- to rise around what the planning mission documents call "Potomac a."

To this itectural smörgasbord has now added the biggest dish of them Any hope that a unified plan will rge has long vanished.

dward D. Stone's unfortunately ted Kennedy Arts Center will soon over that the Watergate is a crush- companion. The 485-foot contin- s façade of Watergate East is just start. When the next two units completed in the fall of 1966, and entire complex by 1968, its bulk have to be compared less with thing adjacent than with the fan- ically booming commercial center Rosslyn, that piece of downtown shington that has slipped its moor- and drifted across the river in last couple of years. Between these areas the virgin wilderness of odore Roosevelt Memorial Island almost obliterated. Upstream the sequences of this large building predictable. The redeveloping rgetown water front between the ros of M Street and the river as- nes a less parklike, more distinct- urban cast.

Given the careful planning and itectural quality that have made emerging Southwest development satisfying a design, the unanswered stion in Washington is why that et, in-town residential standard was ndoned for the developers of the tergate. Even in its rather dubious hitectural company the Watergate ks out. From the interior well of completed building one looks up the toothy concrete fretwork of long, curving balconies. One is teful it is not taller than the city's ximum height; for holding that we can thank the Fine Arts Com- ssion. Miami Beach has a certain ndard within which one can dis- guish between good and bad vul- ity; in Washington vulgarity still the power to shock.

Those responsible for building the Watergate have pretentiously noted that their site "has emerged as the power center of the Western world, the most important city of our age"; and they are confident that it "is destined to become the cultural and artistic center of Washington." But it is impossible to find in what they have created any response to this challenge.

MARKING TIME

If the opening of a season is to be timed on the dial of excellence the new theatre year has not yet begun. The best offering thus far, Peter Shaffer's The Royal Hunt of the Sun (Anta) can get by only through sufferance.

That it should be mistaken for a good play, even a "masterpiece" in the sloppy lingo of Broadway journalism, is not surprising. It is semi-allegorical, a play with an "idea" and "well-written." The aging mercenary Pizarro, crippled, cynical, without hope of gaining anything in this life better than gold, encounters in his conquest of Peru the young Inca sovereign Atahualpa whose rule is just, his people content, his economy opulently communal, his disposition gentle. Pizarro's heart is touched as he beholds something in the Incas' world nobler than the conquistadors' reality of savage plunder. But Pizarro cannot escape from the corruption of his civilization; he is obliged against his soul's desire to destroy the trustful sovereign and to ravage his land and people.

This idea, presumably pregnant in itself, is set forth in scenes dramatically commonplace, in language without individual savor or edge. It is good writing only insofar as it is not bad. But in our theatre where fine writing is rare, literate speech of any sort impresses. Peter Shaffer is educated, and he manages the prose needed to tell his story as any deft English university fellow might.

The actors who represent the Spaniards are directed to speak in an accent vaguely foreign, while those who play the Incas speak in even stranger accents when they are not making outlandish sounds, which in all such plays (or movies) are supposed to imply a primitive vocabulary.

The costumes are colorful, the Inca masks in metal fascinating. Movement is ritualistic in the fashion of certain modern dance recitals in which no special skill is required. There is a certain amount of intoning in unison. The stage, a raked circular disk, is attractively lit in golden tones and our pleasure (if any) is pictorial. Everything in fact is well arranged though fundamentally conventional—that is, lacking in specific content.

Christopher Plummer who plays Pizarro is a real actor. He has an interesting sense of characterization, a voice which he employs to convey age and other special effects. His make-up is an achievement in itself. One feels too a reaching for a deep-rooted pathos in the part, the yearning of a bitterly disillusioned man, a crusty dejection, a kind of cracked idealism. If Plummer, an actor of marked dedication, does not move us as much as his gallant and talented effort warrants, it is because of a basic hollowness in the play.

It is all a product of ability and not of a genuine, subjective impulse or original insight. That is why the elements of spectacle and artfulness in the production made me smile as if I were watching the posturings of children playing at being awesome and august. But even this may satisfy audiences hungry for a semblance of theatre.

Barbara Harris waited three years to appear in On A Clear Day You Can See Forever (Mark Hellinger). The show by Alan Jay Lerner (book and lyrics) and Burton Lane (music) reminds me of the man who knew a joke and wanted a musical built around it. On A Clear Day is about a simple working girl who has extrasensory perception. She is also able to recall a previous life in 18th-century England when she was a high-born lady. That's all. Nothing is added to the "idea" except a lot of expensive scenery. An orchestra seat costs $11.90. A great deal of money is going to be lost. That's show business.

Barbara Harris is an extraordinary talent. She is all transfiguration. She can make anything of herself. Putty-faced, she resembles a woebegone kewpie doll. But she can make herself look like a romantic star, an exquisite aristocrat, a femme fatale. She appears to have no ego or identity of her own: she acquires one through the person she plays. One can see a whole series of instantaneous transformations in her present performance inside a very brief span of time because the character she is supposed to impersonate is nonexistent and she is obliged to replace it with whatever her fancy dictates. She improvises new personalities throughout. A dybbuk seems to be in control.

As I watched her in the new show she took on a symbolic dimension. She became young American stage talent in general: charming, mercurial, full of delightful quirks and astonishing leaps of the imagination, deprived of a fixed destination, a secure purpose. It is a state of perpetual dispersal. She is elusive, provocative, funny and ultimately quite sad. Who will write Barbara Harris a real part?

NOB HILL FESTIVAL

San Francisco

The Ninth Annual International Film Festival has just ended, and compared to the miserable tank-town affairs of previous years it was a real success; at least it was well attended and on certain occasions downright brilliant. This year, there were no prizes, no winners and, therefore, no public defeats to spook a picture later. The festival was advertised as strictly a cultural event with an emphasis upon the word that can be laid there only by persons who do not realize that if you talk about your culture all the time it's a dead sure sign you haven't got it. During the black-tie opening at the spacious white marble auditorium on Nob Hill, the Mayor came on stage and said there was going to be culture; he was backed up in this by Shirley Temple. She was just as unabashed and embarrassing in her real-life young-matronly performance as in an interminable clip from one of her curly-top films in which she, Jack Haley and Alice Faye, dressed in Ruritanian castle-guard uniforms and shouldering wooden guns, sang chorus after tedious chorus of The Toy Trumpeter's Tattoo. The house, packed with dinner jackets and sweeping Trigères, commenced to squirm. When the polite applause was over, grown-up Miss Temple was joined stage by, one by one, the Russ delegation looking bewildered but a seeming overwhelmed by the gr deur of the event, by Ruth Rom several identical television actors black tuxes, Ed Begley and Wi Mays. Somebody in the audience y ed, "Play ball!" Except that it lac gardenia corsages for the girls, affair evinced all the style of a co try-club formal in Winnetka. It was high style, it wasn't even camp, it must have been culture.

After its self-conscious open night (the picture, when it fina came on, was an international duction from Twentieth Century- called Rapture which has already b seen in New York), the festival tled down to serious business. It organized as a center ring, with s porting divertissements. WE SEE no gain coming from the war in Vietnam. We see only the growing victimization of the Vietnamese people, the erosion of a better society at home, and the clear possibility of a world conflict.

WE AFFIRM that no party to the conflict, the U.S. included, has done all it can to bring about negotiations, and since the war will ultimately end at the conference table, we ask new actions to speed that day.

WE ASK that our government

- halt the bombing of North Vietnam
- halt the introduction of additional men and materiel, and ask the other side to do the same.
- reiterate its support for the principles of the 1954 Geneva Accords
- declare its readiness to negotiate with all parties, including the Viet Cong
- declare its agreement to constitution of a representative new government in South Vietnam
- declare its support for international guarantees of a cease-fire, of the rights of minority groups, and of the neutrality of North and South Vietnam.

litely cannibalistic. One director feeds delicately off another. Even Satyajit Ray, way out in India, judging from his entry in this festival, has been nibbling away at the toes of Truffaut, with the result that his film Charulata is not quite digestible. La Soldatesse, an Italian film directed by Zurlini, should have been made by Rosselini twenty years ago. It is the story of a truckload of Greek whores being taken to the Albanian border to service the Italian troops during World War II. There are many fine moments, but the film is ultimately reduced to not-bad by its budget and its technique. The citizens scavenging in the rubble for bits of food are all wearing brand-new clothes, the girls (Anna Karina, Marie Laforet, et al.) are all lovely to look at and beautifully made up—resembling, in fact, a truckload of international movie stars. The lighting is artful and the camera work is slick; but no one who has seen Anna Magnani in that awful skirt and heartbreaking sweater, racing in agony down the street in the terrible natural light of Rosselini's Rome, could accept La Soldatesse as a great film about the war.

The 1939-45 war provided subject matter for 28 per cent of the festival's films, the most intensely awaited of which was Das Haus in der Karpfengasse. It was reported to be the first German-made film dealing with the Nazi deportation and murder of the Jews. It is interesting because of the point of view, but it too suffers from overfeeding on numberless other films of many nationalities dealing with the same subject. Rather than filming from either literature or life, the film makers are filming from films.

Yoyo, one of the best pictures shown during the week, was made by Pierre Etaix who must surely be the most brilliant Clair since René, the most whimsical Tati since Jacques, and the downright funniest dead-pan Keaton since Buster, but they've all been there before him. There is a sequence, however, in Yoyo in which the great man's spat is removed, his shoe unlaced—slowly, slowly—and the long limp tongue languidly lifted out by the delicate fingers of three gorgeous girls, that is one of the lewdest and most hilarious pieces of film ever printed, ranking in my esteem with Chaplin's shoe-eating in The Gold Rush, Keaton's galley scene in The Navigator, and the eating scene in Tom Jones. But Etaix's genius is for the short film and, like Fellini's 8½, from which he has picked up many a morsel, Yoyo becomes tediously sentimental in the end.

James Agee once said in this magazine that Zéro de Conduite, a film made a long time ago by Jean Vigo, was made from the inside out as all great works must be. Ironically enough, the best film in the festival —which was notable for producing no inside-outers—was a short made by Danes about old Michel Simon, who spent most of the footage talking about Vigo who committed suicide when his works were mutilated by vulterine distributors, and who was new wave when Resnais, Godard and Truffaut were schoolboys.

The surprise of the festival, popular and critical, was a picture made around San Francisco by John Korty who gave it the unfortunate title of The Crazy Quilt. Everybody said that amid so much sex and war it was refreshing. It was described as charming, tender and funny; and Korty was called a Smollett of the American cinema. I only repeat what others have said because I'm in the film and am therefore disqualified from making public comment.

The Tokyo Olympiad closed the festival. It was a disgrace, a barely passable piece of hack editorial work that really could have been great. With 1,031 cameras, 232 different kinds of lenses, 400,000 feet of film, 164 cameramen, we end up with two hours of banality and bathos. It was shocking. No wonder the Japanese film industry is sick.

At midnight each night at a suffocating little movie house down in North Beach another festival was held of films by young directors. To my mind this was the most ruthless failure of the whole business, not because of the films, some not bad, but because of the conditions under which one had to view them. Surely the bright new people of the medium should be given equal, if not preferential treatment and not be stuck into a hot little hole after midnight.

The third part of the festival, "The American Director," was where Hollywood came in strong. It was for the old parties and it was nifty. People one had forgotten all about turned up in person—one a day—as though from Forest Lawn. Hal Roach, King Vidor, Busby Berkeley. Each afternoon, Albert Johnson, who was handling the series, showed clips from the films of whoever was the director of the day, then introduced the director himself. The revered guest then sat and reminisced or expounded or answered questions from the audience which was young, attentive and fascinated even by such cryptic types as Lewis Milestone. Each session finished with a showing of the director's favorite film. William Wellman showed Wings and Milestone showed Of Mice and Men, two great movies still. King Vidor showed War and Peace and Mervyn Leroy showed Random Harvest but, of course, you didn't have to stay if you didn't want to. For a rare view of the world behind the screen that movie nuts almost never get, this series was an inspiration, especially valuable for those bright young faces (students got in free) who were discovering Ronald Colman and Barry Fitzgerald.

On Saturdays, in the morning, two special programs were shown. They were listed as Masterpieces of the Cinema of Fantasy, but they were out-and-out kids' shows and sold out solid. The first was The Bluebird made in 1940 by the now departed Darryl F. Zanuck and starring Miss Temple who introduced it in her own unbelievable style. The other was Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. Disney, himself, flew up from the Southland to take charge, and in all that vast crowd (somehow the management sold 400 more tickets than there were seats) not a Film Quarterly, not a Sight and Sound, not even a Nation could be seen.

Army of Sisyphus

Chappaqua, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Although "How To End the Draft" by Prof. Ross Wilhelm (The Nation, Nov. 15) was a comprehensive, to-the-point reductio ad absurdum of our present military conscription policy, there are a few other aspects that make it even more ridiculous than he depicts it.

Throughout our society, for example, there is preached the doctrine of incentive rewards. To decry this doctrine is to risk being regarded as a Communist. Yet the military services do not offer incentive rewards but drag in the young as though they were so many Chinese coolies—or Chinese Communists.

On the other hand, the suppliers of military hardware and services are very much on the incentive-reward system. In order to engage their services the government must guarantee fat profits. If young men should be forced to serve in the armed forces at coolie pay, why should not these suppliers do their job at cost plus a purely symbolic fee? . . .

Of broader significance is the fact that the United States is very gradually slipping into the position of the Roman Empire, dedicated without any debate or public decision of any sort to maintaining a Pax Americana all over the world. Like the conscript Roman legions who were continually engaged, until the empire collapsed of its own excesses, in beating back "barbarians," i.e., non-Romans, wherever they created a distubance, so our conscript legions are called upon to quell everyone who breaks the peace on the theory that they are Communists, the modern version of the barbarians.

The Romans never did quell the barbarians, from whom most of us are descended. Are our conscripts doomed to carry on a similar endless labor of Sisyphus? . . .

Ferdinand Lundberg

New York City

Dear Sirs: Walter Goodman's "The Klan Discovers HUAC" [The Nation, Nov. 8] displays more wit than accuracy. . . .Goodman writes: "Despite complaints of HUAC's opponents, the Supreme Court has never declared that the production of laws is the sole legitimate excuse for the existence of the committees of Congress." While it has been allowed by the Court that Congress may decide against legislating after an investigation, the relationship of inquiry to legislation has been deemed vital. This goes back to Kilbourne v. Thompson a century ago, the Sinclair case in the '20s, and more lately in the Watkins case. Chief Justice Warren, for the majority, said, "No inquiry is an end in itself. It must be related to, and in furtherance of, a legitimate task of the Congress." . . .

Goodman uncritically repeats Weltner's acrid gratuitous smear at the conclusion of Shelton's dubious "testimony," to the effect that grave doubts were now shed on the sincerity of the protesters against HUAC's hearings, and the validity of their protests in the past, as last May in Chicago, when the "leftists" were the object of the committee's attack. Why? Weltner adduced this totally unrelated charge from the lack of picket lines or other demonstrable fervor evinced by HUAC's opponents this time. Goodman ought surely to know and mention that it is illegal to picket on Capitol grounds, and that protests were, on the contrary, organized against these hearings. Kindly note critical resolutions of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, CORE, SNCC, ACLU, Commission of Religion & Race of the National Council of Churches, and that of thirty of the country's most distinguished church leaders organized by the National Committee To Abolish HUAC (see Christian Century, Sept. 22). . . .

Goodman compounds his errors. "The notion of many liberals that these men were plotting to turn the K.K.K. hearing into an attack on the civil rights movement was understandable but misconceived." Nothing of the sort. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., speaking for SCLC and backed by other civil rights groups, said that a HUAC probe of the Klan would provide the opening wedge for an attack on them—for balance. . . . The opposition alleges and implies that HUAC undoubtedly sought through this hearing a dual purpose: (1) to retrieve its damaged national image with this specious "liberal" stance, and (2) to allow the government to evade its responsibilities down in Dixie. . . .

Sylvia E. Crane
Committee To Abolish HUAC

White Plains, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: If the Supreme Court accepted Mrs. Crane's notions of what is unconstitutional behavior, the Committee To Abolish HUAC could abolish itself without further ado. But Congress has a long and by no means discreditable history of investigating for purposes that are not primarily legislative—though, to be sure, legislation is always a potential objective.

It is true that civil rights organizations have issued statements opposing

e purposeful semantic confusion about police ac- s, “an advisory role,” and the rest of it can now be rded. American combat forces are suffering nearly the casualties and doing most of the ground fight- in South Vietnam; practically all plane attacks on h Vietnam have been made by U.S. pilots; Ameri- officers are now in command of numerous South nam units; the costs of the war far exceed the nillion a day of a year ago, and 1,000 American ualties have been reported to date. Nor is the end ight: more troops are being sent, more planes are g flown in. Indeed the greater the degree of our lvement, the longer the shadows extend. Listen few of many warning voices: Gov. George Romney, attitude at home is too optimistic . . . my im- sion is that this war could get a lot worse before ets better”; Jack Foisie in a Washington Post on dispatch quotes an “astute American offi- ”: “it will take a generation”; and Sen. John nis, Chairman of the Preparedness Investigating mittee, “it is sad but true that many of the 6-year- youngsters who started to school this year can ect some time in their lives to patrol the swamps mountains of Vietnam . . . the most serious and yet unanswered question [remains] what happens n we win in Vietnam?” Patently, the South Viet- nese are exhibiting a diminishing enthusiasm for war, and rumors of still another coup d'état are ading. From Taipei our faithful ally and retainer, ang Kai-shek, reports that the Vietnam war can- be won in Vietnam “no matter how many troops” send in.

hese views may be wrong, but they cannot be dis- sed out of hand; they suggest the urgent need for eneral reappraisal before the next—the irreversible teps and decisions are taken. The fact is that we now engaged in a full-scale war in Vietnam, not an “advisory” capacity but in our own name. The raordinary aspect of this war is that it is being ged not by a declaration of the Congress pursuant Article I, Section 8, Clause II of the Constitution, by Presidential fiat. Korea is not a precedent for type of unilateral action, since we fought there ler the thin cover of United Nations sanction. nese and other legal issues are ably developed in lemorandum of Law on “American Policy Vis-à-Vis tnam” just issued by the Lawyers Committee on erican Policy Toward Vietnam, copies of which can obtained from the committee at 38 Park Row, New k, N.Y. 10038.) Never has so large, so dangerous, so costly a war been fought without formal Con- ssional authorization. Clearly the President cannot tinue to wage his war in Vietnam much longer hout asking Congress for a declaration; he has been te explicit that “this is really war.”

Yet a declaration would make it increasingly difficult to restrain the hawks who have been itching to strike at Hanoi and Haiphong, and it would greatly complicate the problem of negotiating a settlement. Before taking such an irreversible step, the President should give renewed thought to the urgent arguments for taking the issues directly to the United Nations. Now that we are an unconcealed belligerent, we are not in a good position to initiate negotiations for a cease-fire or a settlement. For this task we need the services of the sorely tried Secretary-General, who may still be able to arrange the meeting with the North Vietnamese that we would have none of prior to the first Tuesday of November, 1964. By the same token, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee should schedule hearings at the earliest date on the dangers of Presidential wars launched without clear constitutional sanction, without sharply defined or realizable objectives, and, more important, without regard to our obligations under the Charter of the United Nations.

The Paranoid Style

> The distinguishing thing about the paranoid style is not that its exponents see conspiracies or plots here and there in history, but that they regard a “vast” or “gigantic” conspiracy as the motive force in historical events. History is a conspiracy, set in motion by demonic forces of almost transcendent power. . . . The paranoid spokesman sees the fate of this conspiracy in apocalyptic terms—he traffics in the birth and death of whole worlds, whole political orders, whole systems of human values. He is always manning the barricades of civilization.

Thus Richard Hofstadter in The Paranoid Style in American Politics. Mr. Hofstadter is writing about the feverish visions that haunt the far Right and the far Left on the domestic political scene. But he has also provided an apt description of the “style” of American foreign policy in the post-World-War II period. The Congressional Record continues to be studded with speeches in which otherwise rational men denounce the “international Communist conspiracy” in terms that exactly fit Hofstadter's description of “the paranoid style.” The state papers of John Foster Dulles will be found to contain numerous examples of this same style at its blowziest; indeed it has become the language of American diplomacy. The strange alliances we have formed, the billions we have spent on foreign military aid, the dubious methods we have pursued in counterinsurgency and similar endeavors, are but a few of the consequences of overindulgence in this style and the hallucinations from which it springs.

On the domestic scene we have come to reject “the paranoid style” as it is practiced by spokesmen, say, for the John Birch Society, but we are reluctant to concede that the pursuit of American foreign policy could, in any degree, be characterized as paranoid. The excuses usually advanced in the past to explain our indulgence in it have long since lost whatever validity they originally possessed. "The international Communist conspiracy" has now been supplanted by a number of "Communist conspiracies" in some of which Communists conspire against other Communists. Yet we continue to interpret "the international Communist conspiracy" in apocalyptic terms and to impute to it transcendent powers; we cannot rid ourselves of the delusion that all revolutions are Communist-inspired, that is, that history is a conspiracy.

The New York Times has suggested that if we were as politically mature as we like to think we are, we would elect to regard the recent Supreme Court 8-to-0 decision, declaring unconstitutional the 1950 statute that individual members of the Communist Party must register, as marking "the end of an era." Logically, we should then proceed to extirpate, in all its manifold forms, the notion that an American citizen does not have the right to be a Communist. The failure to concede this right was what set the stage for the "paranoid style" in American domestic politics which, in turn, has so deeply influenced American foreign policy. Sooner or later, if we are ever to fashion a more realistic and workable policy, the paranoid aspects of the assumptions underlying cold-war diplomacy must be critically examined and rejected; otherwise our spokesmen will continue to live in fear not of "the enemy" but of domestic political blackmail on the Communist issue. Communists are not ten feet tall. Communist power is neither transcendent nor monolithic. Coexistence with the several brands of communism to be found in the world today is not only feasible, it is imperative. We can no more preserve intact the fabric of constitutional liberties while denying the right of a citizen to be a Communist than we can secure world peace while engaged in a global war against "the international Communist conspiracy."

Cambodia Vindicated

The image of Prince Norodom Sihanouk in the American press is that of a capricious, hypersensitive sophisticate who has permitted himself to become a puppet of Chinese power. But from time to time the curtain of "the official line" is raised a notch or two and a different presence emerges. Seymour Topping's fine series of New York Times articles in mid-October pointed out that the Prince is genuinely indignant about the incursion of South Vietnamese troops into Cambodia; it was on this issue that he broke relations with the United States. The Prince reported to Topping that there had been 726 border incursions, of which nine were particularly serious, in 1964, as against 476, of which three were serious, during 1965.

Topping went on to say that intelligence reports had failed to sustain the old charge that the Vietcong were using Cambodia as a sanctuary or as a supply route. True, he pointed out that it would take an thirty times larger than Cambodia's 30,000 troo

Vietcong had sought refuge from time to tim

Cambodia that the country is not a major sanc

ment and supplies to the Vietcong. This was als

The recent release of a hitherto "secret" rep

strong support to Topping's findings. The IC

May, 1965, in which Cambodia had charged tions of its territory by South Vietnamese troop ernment. Dated July 15, 1965, and released in don, the report has attracted little attention i American press. "No comment" is all that the Department has had to say about it thus far.

bviously somebody needs help. It is probably not ming too much, for example, to suppose that the ter million unmarried women who had children year would have preferred to avoid pregnancy. surely it is no wild assumption to say that mothers se existing brood go to bed hungry, or who eat in ts, would rather not add to the line-up. Ignorance, sometimes poverty—not shiftlessness—are at the of it, as medical-social workers discover again and n.

f the several billion dollars being spent this year he Agency for International Development, report- only $1 million is going for birth-control in- ction. One million dollars. That compares to the million we are spending on foot-and-mouth re- ch. So much for our much-touted concern for a gry and ever hungrier world.

t home we do better, but not much. Officials of anti-poverty program only a few days ago agreed xpand their program for married women to include e living in rural areas. The first grant, a tightwad ,684, goes to York, Pa. Washington is so slow to lle enthusiasm for birth control that last year when ators approached the Department of Health, Edu- on and Welfare for a statement of the extent to ch the federal government is giving money to the es to operate family-planning clinics, they were that HEW didn't keep records of that type. More nt inquiries indicate that that is still HEW's policy. l Dr. Alan F. Guttmacher, president of Planned Par- ood Federation, was hardly exaggerating when he l that federal policy and federal programs are not ays the same, pointing out that although Secretary nterior Stewart L. Udall made birth-control devices ilable to reservation Indians five months ago, only out of every fourteen Indians has actually been ught into the program.

hree generations ago there was a federal law inst sending contraceptive information through the il. We have come some distance from that, but the l evidence of progress will be some sign that Presi- t Lyndon Johnson and the Congress have decided at to do about the proposal of the White House ference that up to $75 million (roughly the cost two space shots) be spent to supply all American nen with birth-control instruction and devices, if y want them. But especially they are to be supplied he poor, many of whom literally do not know where babies come from.

oyage to Nowhere

he New York Times has suggested editorially that e first question raised by the ugly Yarmouth Castle aster is how long can this country continue to allow afe foreign-flag vessels to risk the lives of hundreds American travelers for an easy tourist dollar."

hat's a good question, and we can answer it. The will probably continue as long as the State Depart- nt and the Department of Commerce persist in oking Congress with the warning that to require foreign-flag cruise ships to upgrade their safety standards would ruin us.

Rep. Edward Garmatz of Maryland, who co-sponsored legislation last session that would have forced the "junkyard flotilla," as one witness called it, to submit to the same safety inspections that American ships must undergo, says that the State Department "raised hell" with him for doing it. And in a letter to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, an Assistant Secretary of State argued that to insist on safe standards for the foreign-flag cruise ships that carry half a million Americans every year would be "unreasonable discrimination."

As for the Commerce Department, its minions came before that committee and tearfully deplored any such safety upgrading because it might, indeed, put some of the junk ships out of business and thus "have an adverse effect upon the economics of the Caribbean islands." Commerce Department sincerity in this might be more believable if it were not by now well known that its main objective is not to help a few islands in the Caribbean but to gut the U.S. passenger fleet; for months it has been trying to disband our fleet as uneconomical and to give all such business to foreign ships, safe or otherwise.

The role of the travel agent is also important. When the safety legislation was coming up in Congress this year, the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee sent out to 5,000 travel agents a startlingly prophetic four-page leaflet, the front page of which showed a burning ship. Written over the flames was the warning, "Beware Floating Firetraps—Substandard Foreign-Flag Cruise Ships Can Turn Your Holiday into a Holocaust." The leaflet listed some of the more notorious cruise ships—including the Yarmouth Castle.

But that argument was not as persuasive as the evidence that in 1964, for example, foreign-flag ships carried 90 per cent of American cruise tourists (with revenues totaling $100 million). The president of the American Society of Travel Agents, Inc., wrote the House committee that his organization "enthusiastically" opposed the safety legislation because it would hurt business.

And so—despite testimony that a dozen of the foreign-flag cruisers are more than thirty years old, despite testimony about cruise ships that carry canvas firehoses riddled with one-inch holes and lifeboats equipped with broken oars mended with string—the safety legislation was allowed to die. This is all regrettable, but reviewing it does not answer the Times' question of how long "can" this country allow unsafe foreign ships to risk American lives.

It can go on until an old law is reviewed and reinterpreted intelligently. Since 1886, federal law has prohibited any foreign vessel from transporting passengers between ports in the United States, either directly or by way of a foreign port. Lawbreakers would have to pay a $200 fine for each passenger carried. But in 1912 the Attorney General ruled that this law did not apply to foreign ships taking U.S. passengers on a round trip which returns to the same port. That, the Attorney General said, was a voyage to "nowhere."

When that silly ruling is nullified, as all logic demands, then the problem will be done away with in a stroke, and the business of cruising American citizens will have been returned to American ships, inspected by the U.S. Coast Guard under the strongest safety regulations in the world.

Do Animals Have Rights?

Albert Schweitzer preached "reverence for life" and carried it to such an extreme that he is said to have halted a hospital building project because an ant hill was in the way. In the West, such a view will gain few adherents, but equally rare are persons indifferent to brutal treatment of living creatures, especially those sufficiently docile and affectionate to qualify as household pets. Yet one does not need to be an anti-vivisectionist to become disturbed by widespread laboratory mistreatment and, surprisingly, this appears to be more common in the United States, where Park Avenue poodles promenade in boots and fur coats, than in less affluent Britain.

The British have a tight regulatory system. No one is allowed to experiment on animals without a Home Office license, which is issued only after close investigation of the applicant's professional qualifications and sense of responsibility. Thereafter the work is subject to constant Home Office inspection. Infringement of the regulations may lead not only to withdrawal of license but to prosecution.

In America, a distressing phase of the problem is procurement of animals for experimentation. According to an article by Patrick Young in the October 11 National Observer, serious abuses occur in some areas of this sizable industry. De Gaulle

America's Elder Statesman . . . Alexander Wer

Paris

It was a piece of good showmanship. France had generally assumed that de Gaulle, though 75 on November 21, would run for President in the December 5 election; but he kept the country waiting for a definite yes, and in the last few days before his TV announcement of November 4 even let it be suspected that he might not run. It had been announced a few days earlier that the technicians and cameramen who were to shoot the film at 6 P.M. would remain incommunicado at the Elysée Palace until after the 8 o'clock announcement. This suggested that de Gaulle planned a dramatic surprise, and his yes, when it finally came, produced a universal sigh of relief.

Not that the French people as a whole had been uncritical of de Gaulle. But they foresaw a long period of political unrest and confusion if he did not stand, since his departure would leave Prime Minister

But perhaps this criticism remature: de Gaulle will cer- ly speak two or three times more re December 5, and may either n, or immediately after the vote, icate what constitutional meas- s he has in mind for perpetua- the regime in the event of his rement or death. My guess is t he will wait until after the tion to propose a reform where- the prime minister would (like American Vice President) take r in such an emergency.

nother serious criticism of de lle's broadcast was that he sted of the prosperity France experienced under the Fifth ublic, and of the immense prog- s made in social reforms, housing education. In reality, the prog- s has been less marked in the last en years than during the last or seven years of the Fourth ublic. Since 1963, deflationary dencies have had a regressive effect. Economic growth has been uneven, the position of the underprivileged majority (the working class and peasantry) lagging behind that of the privileged minority. Real wages have risen much more slowly in France than in, for instance, Western Germany, Belgium, Holland or Italy.

Yet, despite these criticisms, it is generally believed that de Gaulle will be re-elected; the only question is, by how many votes? Will he get an absolute majority in the first round, or will he suffer the "indignity" of having to stand in the second round against the most successful of the other candidates? That a second round is not out of the question is suggested by the semi-official announcement that de Gaulle "probably" will run in the second round, if there must be one.

The voting, one may be sure, will be marked by a certain emotionalism, and public-opinion polls, for what they are worth, suggest that the women's vote (54 per cent of the total) is more wholeheartedly "Gaullist" than the men's. Hence the eagerness with which de Gaulle's government hastened to show interest in birth control, after M. Mitterrand, the rival "Left" candidate, advocated the repeal of a 1920 law that banned birth-control propaganda and services. But perhaps too much has been made of this in the foreign press. What is more important is the sentimental appeal de Gaulle continues to exert on French national sentiment. For the older generations he remains the hero of World War II; for younger people he is still the man who "saved France from civil war" in 1958, and who put an end to the futile seven-year war in Algeria. There are no regrets about Algeria, except of course among the traditional extreme Right, which includes the greater part of the several hundred thousand French-Algerian repatriates, most of whom will support Tixier-Vignancour. The fact that de Gaulle has made France "talked about" in the world, and admired by the Third World—above all, that he "stands up to the Americans" and is against the war in Vietnam—flatters national vanity and recommends him even to many people who normally vote for the Left. The attack upon de Gaulle by the State Department and a large part of the American press just as the election campaign was about to start will win him a million votes or more! To be persona non grata in Washington is no liability in French politics. Even Pierre Mendès-France, who has come out against de Gaulle and in support of Mitterrand, admits that the war in Vietnam makes opposition to de Gaulle very much more difficult. The French believe his assertion (off the record, it is true) that the biggest threat to world peace comes today from the power-drunk United States.

Before dealing with the complexities of de Gaulle's foreign policy, here is a brief look at his five presidential rivals. On the extreme Right is Tixier-Vignancour who, for all his "liberal," "European" and "pro-

American" airs, is a typical near Fascist, supported by the most reactionary Vichyite, Poujadist and ex-colonialist elements in France. He provides the best evidence that de Gaulle is not a man of the Right, still less of the extreme Right. In home policy, with his Poincaré-like insistence on financial orthodoxy, de Gaulle is no doubt conservative, but in foreign affairs, he is, as Jean Lacouture remarked in a recent book, "more left-wing than the Popular Front ever dared to be." Tixier-Vignancour, who has considerable funds for his campaign, may get as many as 3 or 4 million votes out of a total of 26 million. Three other candidates—M. Antier, an ultraconservative who claims to represent peasant interests, M. Lecanuet, the young Catholic MRP candidate (most of whose following will vote for de Gaulle in the end) and an obscure right-wing Senator, M. Marcilhacy, sponsored by a certain "McCarthyite" fringe—may be written off as unimportant. There remains François Mitterrand, the candidate of the "United Left." He is supported —in every case, somewhat half-heartedly—by the Radicals (a Right, rather than a Left party), by the half-dead Socialist Party, whose president still is the lamentable Guy Mollet, the hero of Suez and the man who, unlike de Gaulle, proved incapable of standing up to the army and the Algiers Fascists, and by the Communists! Mitterrand's principal assets—and his posters make the most of them—are that he is young and handsome. Nothing would please him better, he said at a press conference, than to become France's Kennedy!

But good looks are not enough. M. Mitterrand's great liability is to have been a Fourth Republic politician which, as Le Monde has said, is "the shirt of Nessus" for any public man in France today. More important, his supporters are such a mixed bunch that he has to confine himself to generalities and platitudes; he must sound "European" and "Atlantic" to please the Radicals and Socialists, but not too explicitly so lest he annoy the Communists, without whose 5 million votes he has little chance of giving de Gaulle any sort of run. So while saying that he is "Atlantic," he has to add that he is also for "coexistence," and even for a "community comprising all the countries of our continent" —almost a paraphrase of de Gaulle's "Atlantic-to-Urals" Europe! The rest of his program is a job lot of generalities about greater social justice, educational reforms, liberalization of the Republic (which would avoid both the "anarchy" of the Fourth and the authoritarianism of the Fifth), and so on.

His most concrete proposal concerns the abolition of the force de frappe, the French nuclear deterrent, and the "categorical reconversion" of France's atomic industry to peaceful uses. Apart from this highly controversial issue (and it is hard to say what exactly the French feel about their national deterrent), his policy statement was dismi cordiality shown Couve de ville suggested that if de Gaulle to Moscow he would be given ımphal reception. After the an- ıcement of November 4, a Tass nuniqué stated that not only lists but many others, im- ;ed by the President's "realistic" gn policy, would vote for him. seemed a clear hint to the ch Communists not to bother t Mitterrand! Ex-Ambassador gradov reportedly told Couve lurville that he hoped de Gaulle d be elected. The Communist s here is in a quandary; it did quote Vinogradov, but its "cam- n" for Mitterrand is less than ıearted. At the Soviet Embassy ıs told that they "didn't know" her Vinogradov had made that ment—not exactly a flat denial he had.

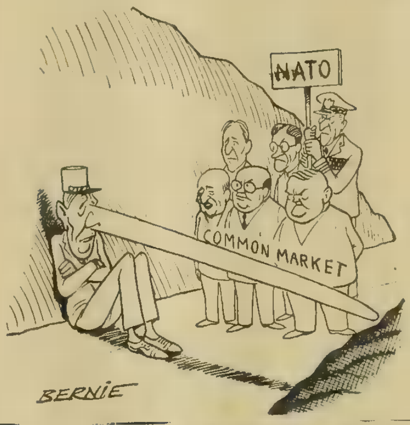
De Gaulle's rapprochement Russia should be taken seri- y. It is not only an election trick ugh it is that, too), and it is h recording that just about the of the Couve de Murville visit londe published an article called ere is only One Super-Power in World Today"—meaning, of se, the United States. Not only Russia been outstripped in the aments race; it had also "lost" ıa and half lost its other allies , economically, was having se- s difficulties. It seemed unable, climatic, geographical and other ons, to feed itself adequately. modernization of Russia's in- tries, dependent to a consider- extent on imported equipment, being delayed because about $1 on a year (a high proportion of available hard currency) was ıg to buy food abroad.

ll this suggests that de Gaulle, ed by the "boundless power" of United States, is tentatively ing a new balance-of-power ıe. He turns the more to this be- se there are growing signs that many, with American encourage- ıt, has begun to rebel against the opean status quo. As D. S. yansky said in his Kremlin ad- ss of November 6: "Right now, de the Atlantic bloc, there is be- ning to take shape something a bilateral military alliance be- en the United States and the leral Republic."

n de Gaulle's view, Russian ag- ssion or hegemony is no longer a threat, but he sees a growing danger of American hegemony, combined with a trigger-happy Pentagon. After his abortive attempt in 1962 to join with Adenauer in a sort of Franco-German directorate over Western Europe, de Gaulle now feels that Russia is the only country as determined as France to oppose an American-encouraged West German revisionism. There is still no question of France's recognizing East Germany; nor, it seems, has there been talk of reviving the 1944 Franco-Soviet mutual assistance pact. Nevertheless, these latest moves contain a serious warning to the United States not to supply West Germany with nuclear arms, nor to encourage its territorial ambitions.



Aux Ecoutes: Ben Roth

From his early childhood de Gaulle was reared in the alliance franco-russe tradition. In 1944 he urged upon Stalin (with little effect) that only "the two great continental countries"—Russia and France—could keep Germany in order. Today he seems to be returning to this old axiom. He does not oppose German "revisionism" in the long run, but his concept of an Atlantic-to-Urals Europe implies a gradual "Europeanization" of the Soviet bloc (hastened by the Russia-China split), and a final settlement of the German problem through an agreement among all the European countries—with little if any American participation, still less "dictation." For Western Europe, and especially France, to become firmly built into the American bloc would mean in the Gaullist view the isolation of the Soviet Union, an increased American aggressiveness and a greater danger of war. The Russians would no doubt much prefer a friendly coexistence with the United States to even the most beautiful alliance with France, but Vietnam makes this impossible. It is curious that in drafting the Franco-Soviet communiqué, the Russians should have pressed for the insertion of the word "coexistence," and that the French should have rejected it.

De Gaulle also fears that if America gets tough with Russia over Germany, Russia may be driven into the arms of China, and his great dream of a "Europeanized" Russia would vanish. (He always refers to "Russia," never to the "Soviet Union," implying thereby that what matters is the nation, not the ideology—Soviet messianism being today as dead as the dodo.)

And what of Europe, the Common Market and NATO? As Maurice Duverger wrote in Le Monde on November 8:

> No doubt Gaullist diplomacy is often clumsy in its methods. . . . But does not de Gaulle still raise some fundamental problems which neither the United States nor certain other Western powers want to recognize? Washington thinks de Gaulle's nationalism is evil in itself, because it hampers the progress of great integrated areas like the European and Atlantic Communities. . . . But there is a vast difference between the nationalism of a powerful state, which breeds only domination, colonialism and imperialism, and the nationalism of a weak state like France, where it expresses a kind of resistance to becoming a satellite. . . . The Atlantic Community, embracing several smaller countries grouped round a giant, can only be a pseudo-community camouflaging an American Empire. When Kennedy said he preferred "partnership" to "leadership," he used a noble phrase, but it meant little in practice. . . . All vitally important decisions on NATO will ultimately be taken by the American President.

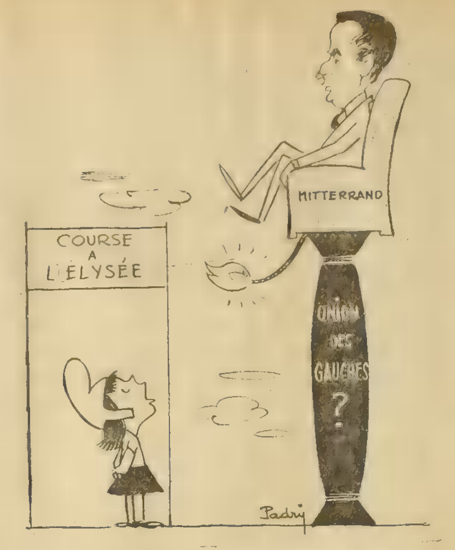
In Duverger's view, de Gaulle knows well enough that, whatever he does, France will continue to be protected by the American atomic "umbrella," for the United States simply cannot afford to lose any part of Western Europe and, above all, France, to the Russians. Since the end of the Algerian War, France has had greater diplomatic freedom than ever before. Still and all, there is this fearful contradiction in Gaullist policy; the more he tries to become independent of the United States, and the more energetically he tries to detach the other members of the Common Market from American influence, the more do they tend to gang up with the giant —Germany, in particular, hoping thereby to reap enormous political dividends. Hence de Gaulle's perhaps rather desperate attempt to redress the balance by sending Couve to Moscow, by threatening to get out of NATO as soon as possible, and by firmly opposing the war in Vietnam—almost alone among America's allies. For, without much liking it, he still remains an ally.

No doubt, many people in France are vividly aware of the danger that the Common Market will break up, and that a new kind of community, based on Washington, Bonn and perhaps London, will emerge. Would France then be left out in the cold, until such a day as de Gaulle disappeared, after which it would submit to American leadership? The trouble with the Common Market is that, whereas de Gaulle excluded Britain because he thought it to be America's Trojan horse, he has since discovered that the real Trojan horse is Western Germany —a horse, moreover, with large and dangerous territorial appetites.

Is it still possible to rescue the Common Market of the Six, with at least a semblance of independence from the United States, and with at least a possibility that Britain would join it, partly to outweigh Germany's increasingly strong position? De Gaulle does not want to commit himself for the present. His "nationalism" (in the better sense of the word, as defined by Duverger) is constantly on guard against the "satellization" of France; hence, in large part, the widespread support he can expect in the country. He has also convinced himself that by taking such an "anti-American" line (even to the point of reviving something of the old alliance franco-russe) he creates doubts in Washington about "Europe's" loyalty, and thus discourages the wilder me the Pentagon and the State Dej ment, who may imagine that "German problem" can be solve shock tactics.



Aux Ecoutes: Ben Roth

"You Think You're Going Into Space With That?"

Can the Gaullist policy suc in the long run? Can the status be preserved until such time as Germans are ready to negotia settlement "among Europeans, de Gaulle has proposed? It lo on the contrary, as though, ex rated by American promises th will soon have access to nuc weapons, Germany is becomin creasingly aggressive and French. Airplanes Abroad

Crashes and Consequences . . . Karl M. Ruppent

Airline crashes make all-too-familiar headlines in the United States, but when such tragedy strikes in this country the ensuing course of action is reasonably clear and the terms of compensation are usually adequate. Because of the overriding interest in safety, an investigation is immediately called. Skilled investigators from the Civil Aeronautics Board arrive quickly on the scene. Roping off the wreckage, they examine it in minute detail. They seek to recover the instruments and to determine their readings at the time of impact. They interview crew, observers and passengers; they listen to recordings of radio conversations. Taking into account all ascertainable facts, they attempt to reconstruct the incident.

These men have been able to unravel some amazingly complex wrecks. They can usually plot the angle of a plane's impact upon a hill. They can often determine the precise moment that fire occurred, and why it broke out. If an accident happens in the air, they often ascertain the speed of plane, its altitude and its dire of flight. With other data, thi vestigation can provide the c of action which is imperative repetition is to be prevented.

So strong is the stress on s in these investigations that ce legal immunities are provided. many witnesses would be inhi in their testimony at formal ings if they feared that their v might later be used against in a civil action, much of thei timony is privileged. rough the efforts of the Inter- nal Civil Aviation Organization O), it has been possible to dardize navigation equipment ughout the Western world. Thus lot making an instrument ap- ch in Paris, Pernambuco or ia is able to use standard pro- ires and the instruments with ch his plane is equipped. The orne nations have even agreed n a universal language (Eng-) and have composed stubborn erences regarding feet and ers, inches of mercury and bars, statute and nautical miles. all these accomplishments are he area of technical standardi- on; in other areas standardiza- has not gone far enough.

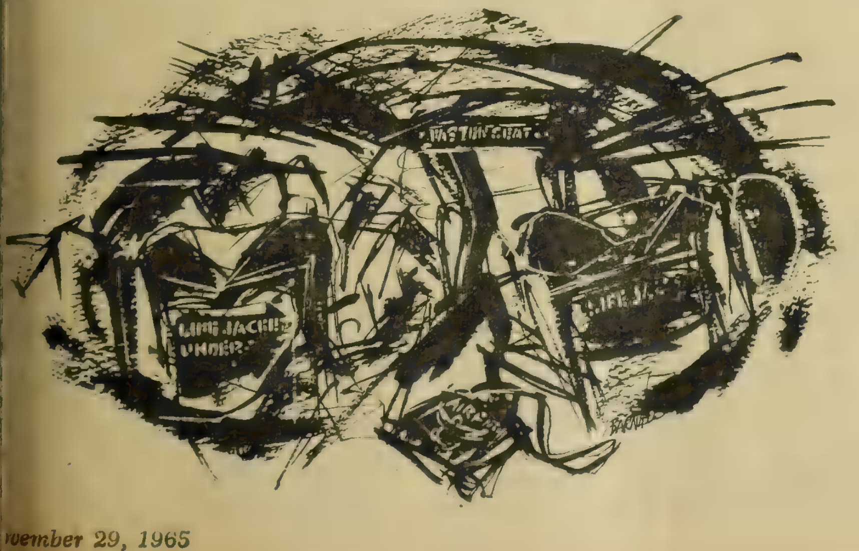
Vhen an airplane crashes in Eu- e, as one did not long ago at ne's Fumicino airport, a trained estigator from the CAB does not e charge. Indeed, the first offi- who was immediately concerned was not an official of the Italian Government, nor even of the city of Rome. Fumicino is located in a small municipality, and the local equivalent of the justice of the peace is the official in command. Since a death has occurred, it is his duty, under an ancient law, to discover and apprehend the culprit, and to accomplish that end he is vested with full authority to impound chariots, commandeer horses and interrogate men.

Even highly skilled investigators equipped with the most ingenious devices may have difficulty in discovering what flaws or errors caused an accident of this kind. Without a cadre of specialists, no investigation worth the name can be held. Of course, technicians from the nation's aviation department will eventually arrive on the scene, and in the usual course of events, they will invite full participation from our CAB. But the inevitable delay confuses evidence and clouds the memories of survivors. This delay will occur—whether the accident be in Italy or in almost any other country of the world—because the legal system has not kept pace with technology.



The next of kin of those killed in air accidents abroad are in for another shock. When a plane crash occurs in this country, the bereaved relations may receive a substantial indemnity. Following the system of the common law developed in England, every transportation company, whether air line, railroad or bus, is in a sense the insurer of its passengers. Since there is little that a passenger can do to prevent an accident, the law charges the carrier with providing him a safe journey, and if an accident occurs, the law presumes that the carrier is at fault. There is no need to prove negligence; indeed, there is seldom need to prove more than that the accident actually happened. Res ipsa loquitur, in legal parlance, "the transaction speaks for itself." The burden is on the carrier to prove that the event was beyond its control.

Sizable judgments for wrongful death are sometimes awarded. Here again the law relies heavily on its English underpinnings. A jury may award more for the death of a prominent man, and for a breadwinner, than for a little-known man or an unemployed member of the family. In theory, the size of the judgment reflects the earning capacity of the deceased and his life expectancy.

In some parts of the country juries are especially generous. If an accident occurs in California, the probabilities of large indemnities are much greater than they are in states where life is presumably held less dear. It would not be uncommon in the Golden State for the jury to award $100,000 to the bereaved.

But your life is far less valuable in Europe—$8,290 to be exact. As a passenger flying from New York to San Francisco, your life may well be worth half a million, but should you be so improvident as to board a flight that terminates, originates or flies through another country, then the bargain-basement price applies. This deflation is the result of a treaty negotiated by some ninety nations in Warsaw in 1929. Troubled by the possibility that large judgments might cripple the then infant air lines, signatories at the Warsaw Convention agreed to this standard $8,290. The convention became applicable to American international carriers when the United States Government ratified it in 1935. By this agreement, potential conflicts in the common law, Roman law, and various other legal systems of the world were neatly resolved. Not until 1955, in the Hague Protocol, was the standard indemnity raised to $16,300. But even this niggardly amount does not apply to all carriers, since the United States has not ratified that pact.

Unsuccessful in its efforts to persuade the various air lines of the world to agree upon more realistic limits, the State Department has now given the required six-month notice of its intention to abrogate the Warsaw Convention. Once this action has been taken, the CAB could then require the U.S. carriers to provide free insurance for all their passengers. But apparently in a conciliatory mood, the State Department announced that it would be receptive to a renegotiation of the Warsaw Convention, increasing the standard indemnity first to $75,000, then later to $100,000 per passenger.

Reluctant to expose themselves to payments of this size, the air lines that are members of the Int national Air Transport Associati have belatedly voted to raise the demnity to $50,000—but only those member air lines that oper to and from the United States. the same time, the IATA agreed permit air lines operating in oth parts of the world to increase th indemnity in like amount.

If the State Department accep this compromise, as it may, the would still be tremendous variatio in the value placed on death by crash. The life of a successful bu nessman, flying on vacation to E rope, Mexico or Bermuda, would worth only $50,000. And should suffer a fatal air accident in so of the less well-traveled parts the world, his heirs would coll $8,290—a sum negotiated in Pola when a laborer there earned but a day and bread was 5c a loaf.

Frank Potte

Rockport, Mass.

This is my story. I am the Episcopal clergyman who "produced the show," the symposium called Anatomy of Prejudice. At the moment of writing I am 39 and quite nicely hidden by obscurity as a parish priest in Rockport, Mass., a town of 5,297 (the figure triples in the summer when visitors come to smell the sea and savor the quaintness). In Rockport, not much ever happens from the point of view of a minister viewing "his" world, unless he decides to make something happen. My life here has, however, not been serene, possibly because of my peculiar notion that people should try to live in the century in which they find themselves.

When I first came to Rockport in August of 1963, I looked around and saw a nice, respectable, lily-white town. Not a Negro in sight. Now there is one—thank God for his bravery and that of the landlord who accepted him. I noticed a few Jewish people, but somehow they didn't seem to figure, psychically, in the make-up of the town. Quite well-to-do, ran my quick observation, and apt to go elsewhere when the summer season ended. I saw the members of my parish, of whom some 200 contribute to the upkeep of the ecclesiastical institution. But mostly, remembering an old adage that the church exists for the benefit of those outside itself, I looked around and saw at least 100 art galleries nestled prettily along the narrow streets and under the stately elms. Aha, said I, I am in the midst of a thriving art colony, and this is the world that our church must meet and embrace and learn to love.

To be a minister in an art colony can be a dismaying prospect when the last art museum you attended was twenty years ago at the command of a college professor. Yet there was an obvious appeal, too. In the religious vocation we strive to become artistlike as we plan and conduct services, seeking to express what is ultimately true about man as he confronts what he considers divine. Perhaps, then, the artist and the churchman are more like-minded than would be indicated on the surface. Also, I had my own preconceived stereotype of the a ist as a sensitive, giving soul, acu ly responsive to the ills and nee of mankind, albeit not much infl enced by Ben Franklin's maxi for prudent living. All in all, it w a noble challenge, worthy of t best efforts of St. Mary's parish broaden and extend itself.

So what to do. In August of 19 we put on what we called A Ce bration of Religion and the Arts attempting to proclaim to all co ers that here is a marriage fe where we can joyously drink a to to our joint responsibility to expr what is beautiful, true and go The format was designed for ma mum impact—an exhibition of c temporary art, five evening even and five afternoon discussion riods, all compressed into one week. When vas all over, we felt justified in rejoicing. Financial costs were covered, and a nice little controversy, mostly about the church's sponsorship of modern art, enlivened the letters column of the local newspaper. I cherished the observation of a young Lutheran minister that we seemed to have captured the same spirit of Pope John-inspired "Aggorniamento" that he had observed at a memorial service for Medgar Evers in New York a week earlier. Yes, I remember thinking at the time, this is about as close to the civil rights movement as we can get, here in Rockport. That was in the summer of 1964.

As the winter of 1964-65 made its usual slow and tortuous way toward spring, people began to ask: "What are you going to do this summer?" I felt confident that we could "do it again" on a bigger and broader scale. In my enthusiasm for the future I conveniently forgot the bad omen of an anticlimactic ending to the Celebration of Religion and the Arts. To mark its happy conclusion, my wife and I had invited the entire active list of the Rockport Art Association—about 200 people with local galleries—to an "open house" at the church rectory. This was the group whose existence had stimulated my dream of a marriage of religion and the arts in the first instance, and not a single one of them came around to share our proffered hospitality. Perhaps it is just as well that I was too exhausted by that time to care about reading the telltale signs. The Anatomy of Prejudice might not have taken place in 1965.

The spark for that venture was struck one morning in early April, when a woman burst breathlessly into my office, handing me a book by Prof. Gordon Allport, The Nature of Prejudice, and saying: "Yes, there is something we can do here in the North, here in Rockport. Why not build this year's religion and arts program around the theme of prejudice?" Why not! The speaker, a devout Roman Catholic, had lived all her life in the world of the arts, with twenty years' experience as curator in one of the nation's leading art galleries. At the time she was employed part time by a brand new Rockport attempt at enriching the life of the town—The Land's End Cultural Center. I was a board member much interested in the welfare of this struggling enterprise and I knew from experience that I had to have the expert knowledge of art which my visitor was volunteering to provide. A deal was made. In August, 1965, a week-long symposium in religion and the arts would be called The Anatomy of Prejudice and would be jointly sponsored by St. Mary's Church and the Land's End Cultural Center.

Without foreseeing it at the time, I was asking for additional trouble by linking our church with the cultural center. In some quarters of small-town America, "culture" is a suspect word. No matter that "cultural center" has become the generic term for programs now backed with huge financial resources by our federal government. There is a feeling among the natives that culture may be just another way of softening up the landscape for the advent of communism. Perhaps it didn't help that the backbone of the Land's End group included several fine people of Jewish background. Slowly, the stage was being set for antagonism, in the guise of apathy.

Plans went ahead rapidly to borrow art works and secure the services of speakers and musicians, dancers and clergymen, newspaper men and civil rights leaders, for the August event. In retrospect, I suppose I was too much engrossed in the work of preparation to pay attention to the rising tide of negative local reaction. In the spring the governing body of our church was considering major repairs to the church-owned house in which my family lives. A rumor spread around town that the Episcopal Church was spending all that money to house a bunch of "niggers" on the third floor. There could have been substance to this rumor. In June, our Cape Ann Council for Civil Rights played host to a busload of high school boys and girls from Selma, Ala., in our various homes. In early July, we had a Brazilian girl staying with us on an International Fellowship program, and later in the month another group of Negro youngsters, members of Roxbury's Blue Hill Freedom Choir, came to stay and sing and also to dance with us in the parish room of St. Mary's. I'll never forget the sight of the Rockport high school boy on the night of the dance as we awaited the arrival of the bus from Roxbury. Seeing the poster proclaiming "Dance Tonight" on the door of the church, and sensing the air of anticipation, this lad ran home at top speed to change clothes and apply comb to his Beatle mop. Then back to the church at top speed just as the bus rolled in. Eyes popping and face reddening, he turned to his buddy with voice stricken: "Geezus, they're coons!"

August arrived. A few local artist friends helped to hang the exhibition of some eighty works on the theme of prejudice, filling both our parish room and the walls of the former Coast Guard station, now the cultural center and a lovely spot fronting the Atlantic Ocean. George Collins, religious editor of the Boston Globe, began a feature story with this quotation:

> "The only way to bring light into a mass of darkness is to open it up. It will never penetrate from the inside."
> This philosophic comment on prejudice came this week from Rockport artist Joseph Jeswald as he described his painting, "The Bristling Mass," which has been loaned by the Addison Gallery at Andover for the unique week-long arts program which opens in Rockport on Sunday.
> Jeswald's painting portrays in dark colors a massive phalanx of people with spears rising above them. At one side of the painting, light flows up to the mass, but is unable to penetrate.
> "Prejudice is like this in groups of humans," Jeswald said. "Unless man can be exposed to prejudice in all its forms, little change will take place in our society. Enlightenment cannot be forced on mankind, knowledge of truth must come from inside."

In the weeks preceding the symposium I was coming to feel, increasingly, that the bristling mass depicted by Jeswald in his painting, was not too inaccurate a description of the reaction of the majority of my parishioners. Only a handful showed genuine enthusiasm, and it proved very difficult to find enough volunteers to serve as hosts at the art exhibition and events. Yet I was heartened by memories of the previous year's success, and went right ahead, committing our venture to a budget of $3,000—quite a sum for a small church, whose membership could not be expected to contribute more than $500. How could I possibly justify spending $100 just to have one huge painting, 9 by 18 feet, carted down from Boston by moving van? In a way I was relieved to be relying on outside visitors for the bulk of contributions.

Other reactions from the local community came to my attention. A summer visitor who does free-lance writing for the North American Newspaper Alliance came into my office just before the week began. She was filled with foreboding. With a newswoman's eye for a story, she had read the local publicity for The Anatomy of Prejudice and had proceeded to test opinion throughout the town. Nobody was going to attend, she informed me. They envisioned the town flooded with Negroes, and they wanted no part of it. They were suspicious of the Land's End Cultural Center and thought St. Mary's should go back to minding its o — "spiritual" — business. The l was both right and wrong, as shall see presently.

I tried to dismiss the warnir There was too much to be plea and proud about. Never in my sh career as a clergyman had I more in tune with the times, m certain that I was going about Lord's work. A feature writer for Hartford Times quoted me in article that appeared on Septem 4:

> Mr. Potter said that he started t annual art program because "t church historically has concern itself only with people in their p vate residences and with their p vate morality and has neglect three other worlds in which peop live—that of work, leisure, and pu lic issues."
> Mr. Potter represents a new at tude in church leadership—a bel that the church must be concern with such issues as urban renew housing, education, and civil righ —as well as theology. Further, says, "The church itself has co tributed to prejudice—if you belo to one sect you are saved. If not. .

The article went on to paraphr our art director:

The Los Angeles riots burst in full fury as the symposium started, and this hurt in two ways. As is true all over the country, the riots allowed those whose stereotypes of the Negro were weakening to go back to the old ways of closed minds and hearts. More directly, one of our Tuesday evening panelists for a discussion on prejudice was to have been Rev. James Breeden, a brilliant young Negro clergyman who serves on the Commission of Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches. As representative of the interest of 40 million Protestants he had to be in Los Angeles, not Rockport, that evening. He was sorely missed.

A more humorous upset in plans occurred the next evening when the traveling theatrical troupe arrived two hours late to perform an Ibsen play in the church, and only then because I authorized their chartering a plane at our expense (more tongue wagging at the rector's spendthrift ways). Strangely enough, a hundred persons remained in sweltering heat and saw a midnight show preceded by a hastily devised organ recital. And this was the one evening of the week that most conservatives could enjoy; for though it is apt enough, there is nothing in An Enemy of the People to stir one's passions about civil rights.

The next day my sagging spirits were revived by a fan letter from a Roman Catholic, then unknown to me: "Indeed this very fine exhibition and program has taken on the adjective of 'great,' for because of the missing panel member and a tardy play performance, we were given the opportunity of 'feeling' with you the intensity of your dedication to this field of prejudice. Congratulations for making the awareness of prejudice more vital to my husband and me."

Ben Shahn, artist, writer, social critic, was the "biggest name" on our program. Among a capacity audience of ninety for an informal afternoon discussion, there was not one member of my parish in attendance. That same Thursday evening, among 350 assembled at the cultural center for another panel, there was not a single male member on hand to pass the collection plates for a free-will offering. That evening the star who shone brightest was an articulate Negro social worker and consultant, Noel Day, from Roxbury. "I must be nonviolent," said Day. "I cannot do violence to myself." He helped us understand the basic causes of what happened in Watts.

On Friday, a Mass, or Holy Communion, was celebrated in the church, with original music in the folk idiom for singing with guitar accompaniment, and on Saturday a program of modern dance was offered by a New York Company headed by Gus Solomons, Jr., a Negro architect turned artist. Gus Solomons wrote us afterward: "For myself and my dancers I want to thank you formally and officially for inviting us to dance in Rockport. We did have a very good time and the audience's response made us terribly happy."

It was all over and I was terribly happy too. More than $2,500 had been donated during the week, and we were free and clear financially. I could forget how the member of the local art association had commented cheerfully on leaving the church's display of museum pieces (Barlach, Baskin, Beckmann, Bellows, Daumier, Durer, Goya, Grosz, Hogarth, Levine, Matisse Steinberg, et al.), "How nice to see these things without having to go all the way into Boston." I need remember only that the curator of prints from the Metropolitan in New York had dropped by unannounced and had written to our art director: "I cannot go without telling you how much I was moved by your beautiful print show at St. Mary's in Rockport. You used the charming odd-shaped spaces so intelligently, and assembled such unexpected and eloquent images that you made the tour of the show into an experience to remember." But must I also remember that the web of apathy spun from hostility was being drawn tighter and tighter all the while that crowds of out-of-towners were flocking to The Anatomy of Prejudice (they included two Catholic nuns from St. Paul, Minn., who came for the entire week and graced us with their presence at every single event)?

Yes, I must remember. The crowds have gone and winter is coming again. My ministry continues among the good church people of Rockport, a majority of whom have told me in a hundred ways that the program in religion and the arts is a waste of the Lord's precious time. If there were any signs at all of changing hearts among our people, I would try again next summer, but I cannot discern those signs. As a Christian I am free to follow where God may be leading, but as rector of a parish I am the servant of my people.

I must be honest, particularly with myself. The most significant failure of our program has to do not so much with my parishioners as with those in the community whom we set out to embrace in the first instance—the art colony of Rockport. A trusted adviser put it this way: "Frank, you have made an honest mistake, but a mistake. The prevailing climate of Rockport is not artistic, it is commercial. You have sought to engage the interest of men and women who are not artists, but artisans, whose skill in craftsmanship happens to occur with paint and brush rather than hammer and saw. They do not wish to be disturbed, or to think. Their first concern is for economic survival and their values are the same as anywhere in middle-class America."

Prof. Kenneth Clark, author of Black Ghetto, said it more vividly when he admitted that he wakes up at night from nightmares, dreaming that the civil rights movement may come to an end with all Negroes being taught and manipulated to adopt the value structure of white, middle-class America. Is there not a better way, a higher ideal toward which we may strive?

I think there is. In the struggle against prejudice in the North the quiet struggle against apa this past summer in Rockpor think I have caught a flee glimpse of what needs to be d I cherish this letter which I ceived in October from a coupl New York City:

> Shalom and Pax Vobiscum. Af a few days in Rockport this su mer, we came to the conclusion t aside from the art activities, it u a cultural waste-land—that is, u we came upon the poster about y symposium "The Anatomy of Pre dice." This gave us a raison d'e for remaining in Rockport, and thank you. . . .

Let us start from the stance ta by Noel Day as he addressed gathering last summer: "There no Negro problem in America; th is no white problem. There is a human problem." Let us cr new concepts of community, structures through which the ganization of social change may carried on. It is not sufficient say—the church stands for t the artist stands for that, the b nessman stands for this or t Stereotypes which perceive mar governed by his "role" in life m be abandoned. We need to forr new aristocracy—an aristocracy THOSE WHO CARE.

THE INCOMPLEAT SUICIDE . . . Matthew Huxl

Every twenty-five minutes around the clock in 1963, a human being killed himself in one of our fifty states. Of the 1.8 million deaths that year, 20,818, or 1.1 per cent of the total, were recorded as suicides. These men, women and children who took their own lives were the focus of a widely publicized, day-long Symposium on Suicide held recently in Washington D.C. It was organized by the Department of Psychiatry at George Washington University School of Medicine, with a grant by the Wallace Laboratories.

Despite the fact that the meeting was called to "exchange views about a subject which has reached the magnitude of 'a public health problem,'" the general orientation of the symposium did not show a "public health attitude" in its approach to suicide. Thus, few epidemiological data essential to place suicide in relationship to other causes of death were presented; and while there was much discussion about the causes of suicide and would-be suicide, the primary concern of the symposium was with cause as the basis for individual treatment and rehabilitation, not as an approach to public policies and programs seeking to prevent its occurrence. In short, the meeting was basically a medical symposium on the management of the would-be suicide.

One may speculate that the symposium's emphasis on therapy stems from the general preoccupation of modern medicine with the treatment of sickness rather than the maintenance of health, for certainly there was a strong common b among most of the panelists: of fourteen discussants, only two v non-physicians—a sociologist a Roman Catholic priest; while the twelve physicians only one pharmacologist, was not a psyc trist (though one psychiatrist also a public health officer). professional orientation may have been the reason why the demiologic method was not to determine the issues aro which social policy needed to made. Nevertheless, the var ideas and techniques presentec this symposium could eventu help outline an effective nati approach to suicide.

Dr. Stanley Yolles, dire of the National Institute of Me Health, pointed out that the sui rate is universally and profou fected by the major demographic aracteristics of sex, race, age dis- bution, population density, urban- ation, marital status, family size id economic level. At the same ne, a number of cultural charac- ristics, such as the competence id interest of physicians, the ad- inistrative system, and the status suicide in the eyes of law, re- gion and the particular social code, ive an equally profound impact pon the accurate recording of its currence.

However, as Dr. Erwin Stengel Sheffield University, England, ointed out in a witty presentation the expense of the World Health rganization's compendium of year- suicide statistics around the orld, one country's statistics may another's disgrace. Underrecord- g is certainly a world-wide phe- omenon, and its degree varies not erely from nation to nation but gionally within countries, and by iltural sub-units of the popula- on. Thus, for example, it has been stimated that somewhere between ne-quarter and one-third of all suicides in the United States go unreported. All that can be said is, the older and more efficient a nation's vital statistics service, the more constant is the relationship of that nation's suicide rate to the reported rates of other nations. There has been a slow, gradual world-wide rise since the turn of the century, a rise which shows definite seasonal fluctuations, only occasionally punctuated by rare episodic peaks and troughs seemingly related to vast upheavals such as world wars and economic depressions.

If the symposium skimped the epidemiological elements, there was no dearth of speculation on the presumed causes of suicide and would-be suicides. Because of the make-up of the group, most of the speculation was psychiatric and psychoanalytical, with sociological considerations running a poor second best. Dr. Roy Grinker (Michael Reese Hospital, Chicago), after discussing a large number of hypotheses, could only conclude: "I do not know—despite lengthy clinical experience which included an average expectable suicide rate—what the dynamics are that push the patient from thought to action. . . ." Certainly suicide stems from no single reason; it is a highly complex behavior pattern, reflecting conflicting tendencies whose outcome depends on their relative strengths, as well as on various other unpredictable factors.

Dr. Stengel has organized all the hypotheses into five groups: the "appeal effect" (which creates guilt feelings in the friends and relatives of suicides or would-be suicides) with its "cry for help," which may not be audible to the untutored listener; the "ordeal function" (gambling with fate or risk-taking behavior, both overt and covert), which is pervasive in our society and runs all the way from penny ante to Russian roulette, from the child's "testing" of his parents to excessive speeding; plus three other groups suggested by Dr. Karl Menninger: that the suicide is simultaneously killing himself, murdering someone else, and fulfilling his wish to die.

Posada

Sociological hypotheses derive in the main from Emil Durkheim's classic and fundamental monograph written at the turn of the century, in which he postulates three types of suicides: the egoistic suicide who was poorly integrated into the social group; the altruistic suicide driven to self-destruction by excessive altruism and sense of duty (a very small group including both martyrs and those committing hara-kiri); and the anomic suicide, which connoted a loss of integration by an individual previously in equilibrium with his society. Prof. Jack Gibbs (Department of Sociology, Washington State University) found difficulty with Durkheim's triad, as have many others. However, starting with Durkheim's unprovable concept that the greater the social integration of a population the lower the suicide rate, Gibbs offered a testable hypothesis which proposes that the greater the status integration of a population, the lower the suicide rate. Gibbs concluded by suggesting that psychiatrists need well consider the significance of status patterns in a community before advising patients to change jobs or retire, marry or divorce, etc., since such major changes in status may have very severe consequences.

The problem of the would-be suicide is more complex than the actual suicide by several orders of magnitude. Not merely are we without an adequate definition for a suicide attempt, but an attempt to apply those that have been proposed makes epidemiological investigations extraordinarily complex, difficult and tedious. English, Swiss, Swedish and American studies suggest that the ratio of attempted suicides to actual suicides runs anywhere between 6 to 1 and 15 to 1; and in the extraordinarily few follow-up studies of attempted suicides, the number repeating the first attempt, and succeeding, may run as high as 10 per cent. Thus people who have attempted suicide present a risk group far higher than the general population. In effect, they constitute a pool from which many of the future suicides will be drawn.

It has been postulated that the would-be suicide and the successful suicide show different characteristics and thus represent different populations: more women than men attempt suicide while more men succeed; the attempter group is younger, may have somewhat different motivation, etc. But in Dr. Grinker's candid words: "What is the difference between a suicidal 'gesture' and the bona fide suicide? Gestures which seem to be emergency communications for help often result accidentally in a completed act, and many apparently truly intended acts are frustrated. Little reliance can be placed on the manifest intent or at least on the interpretation put on it by the observer. When [one is asked] the embarrassing question how one differentiates a 'gesture' from an intent, the only honest answer is 'guess.'"

Nevertheless, because these would-be suicides are the ones who are often seen and sometimes treated by the professional, their psychosocial dynamics are of primary concern to the various suicide-prevention centers here and abroad.

The key to these centers' operations is that the would-be suicide (and indeed, the successful suicide) nearly always indicates intent, often well in advance of the act; that his "cry for help" can be heard and its recognition taught; and that help can be provided early enough to assist the individual in his misery and so prevent the attempt. That those calling for help are wretchedly miserable is quite clear: most suicides and atttempted suicides can be classed, psychiatrically, as being afflicted with depressions.

The causes of depression are open to considerable debate, though clearly they range through two components—the first being psycho-social and the second physiological. Of the former, one widely accepted concept is that depression has its roots far in the past, often in early childhood, and slowly builds up through time. The view is somewhat supported by one of the very few studies ever done on child suicides (made in the New Jersey schools between 1960 and 1963). The critical factor seemed to be social and emotional isolation: the child suicides formed part of no social group; they had no close friends, no one to whom they could feel close, with whom they could share their innermost thoughts; no one who could accept them as they were. Their suicides seemed the culmination of a long-drawn-out process. However, Dr. Reginald Lourie (George Washington University School of Medicine), reporting on his study of child-suicide attempters, drew no such conclusion. He remarked upon the seeming impulsiveness of the attempts. Most of his children had "impulse control problems, and came from a cultural milieu which encouraged or even stimulated impulsivity." Chronic depression was not a major determinant in Lourie's group; he suggested that it appeared only later, in mid or late adolescence.

Evidence for a physiological factor was outlined by Dr. Grinker. Stemming from observations that sleeplessness is a major warning signal in the potential suicide, he noted the frequency with which alcohol and barbiturates are found in the body of the suicide (but not as a major cause of death). Alcohol is a psychic amplifier, elevating or depressing the basic mood, and barbiturates are mood depressing (according to Dr. Frank Berger of the Wallace Laboratories). Both drugs affect the higher cortical functions. These functions are additionally modified by anxiety which, althou it is a protection against inter cerebral activity, also induces slee lessness. Indeed, both anxiety a sleeplessness are most frequen precipitants to suicide.

Additionally, depressed patier have recently been shown to ha unusually high levels of adrenoc tical secretions as a stress respon to anxiety. One group of investig tors has gone so far as to be al to establish a correlation betwe suicidal activity in the depressi state and high levels of 17-hydro steroids. In short, the fine balan required of the higher-level co cal functions would seem to be ea ly upset not merely by psychologic but also by physiological, as well pharmacological, stimuli. This w amplified by Dr. Berger in his an ysis of the physiological factor depression, but its possible imp cations were barely noted by t other discussants.

Do remedies now exist f depression? Dr. Berger pointed electroshock as a most effecti therapy for counteracting suici tendencies in the severely depre ed. Among the anti-depressants a tranquilizers (to reduce anxiet can be found specifics which a rapid in their effect upon the p tient, though here the difficu lies in the physician's manageme of the case. Since these drugs gi symptomatic relief only, witho affecting the underlying cause the depresssion, the six-to-nin month cyclical nature of the d order must be kept in mind: sudd discontinuance of the drug bef the depression has run its cou may easily result in suicide.

A diametrically opposite view w held by Dr. Eli Robins (Departme of Psychiatry, Washington Univ sity School of Medicine, St. Loui who asserted: "There are no cr cal data to support the ideas th drugs, electroshock therapy, or p chotherapy are effective in suici prevention. Until such data a forthcoming, hospitalization [in psychiatric institution] seems to the soundest policy."

The suggestion of a speci psycho-active drug has a correl in the possible existence of a b chemical test for the suspected s cide; or, best of all, for mass-scree ing programs. A straw in this p ticular wind is the development

What then were the sympo- m's views of the suicide-preven- n center? Dr. Robert Litman hief Psychiatrist, Los Angeles icide Prevention Center) believes at these are crisis-oriented services, ld outposts of a medical center: he more extreme the crisis, the s specific professional training necessary to be of help [since the tient] must be transferred with reful haste to a crisis clinic or to (psychiatric) hospital." In public- alth terms, this is a first-aid and ferral program. It is not a pre- ntion program. The center's treat- ent of a suicidal gesture can and es prevent the suicidal act, but offers no program to attack the owth of those underlying causes ich finally bring a potential sui- de to the critical point where he eds the first-aid, emergency serv- . Only Dr. Berger gave any ought to this problem, and he fo- sed primarily upon the potentials biochemical screening tests for se finding.

Certainly, such tests would be of estimable value—as would be ose which could detect the po- ntial schizophrenic. But once we ve found the potential suicide, hat kinds of support can we de- lop in his familial and social en- ronment to prevent his future eakdown? What social mechanisms might be evolved to prevent the accumulation of factors which, when left untreated, transform the potential suicide into would-be if not actual suicide.

Suicide is probably one of the most complex problems that face the epidemiologist today, and while cross-national and cross-cultural comparisons should be received with intense skepticism, this is not to decry all statistics on suicide. Witness, for example, Louis Dublin's elegant analysis of U.S. data published two years ago (Suicide: A Sociological and Statistical Study, Ronald Press), or Dr. Stengel's dry summary of 1964 (Suicide and Attempted Suicide, Penguin, London), or Durkheim's famous essay of 1951 (Suicide: A Study in Sociology, The Free Press).

Even though reporting may be faulty, suicide rates and ratios are useful in examining and developing specific programs. Both Dr. Yolles and Dr. Lourie, for example, singled out the young adolescent male as being singularly susceptible to suicide (see table on this page). When we examine specific age groups for suicide as a per cent of all deaths for that group, we find that the adult male, 25-34, is most at risk. One out of every thirteen deaths of these young men is reported as a suicide, a ratio considerably larger than that of any other age group. If we look at the actual number of suicides, then the crisis years fall in the last two decades of a man's working life, rising steadily from the middle decades, 35-44, and declining somewhat in the first retirement decade, 65-74.

Suicide as a per cent of all deaths within specified age categories; the per cent of all suicides produced by populations within specified age groupings, and the age specific suicide rate, are the simple mathematical tools which an epidemiologist might use to start an attack upon suicide. They would then be applied to other groups into which a total population is customarily broken down: sex, race, marital status, economic condition, etc. These findings, combined with the insights of those treating the would-be and unsuccessful suicide, might eventually lead to an acceptable theory as to causes and a generalized program of prevention.

Only when we pull together the factors that sensitize a human being to killing himself can we hope to develop an effective national approach to suicide. And while these factors are interrelated, they are so diverse that many professional skills and insights must be conscripted for the task. To the psychiatrist, sociologist, pharmacologist and cleric of the recent symposium, then, must be added the epidemiologist, anthropologist, psychologist, physiologist, educator and community organizer. Only a multiplicity of imaginative talents can conceive the programs that will entice the emotional isolate back to the world of the living. Let us hope that we shall find these talents on a next symposium—a symposium that will, in fact, treat suicide as a possible public health problem.

The Deepest Involvement of All

THE SPANISH REPUBLIC AND THE CIVIL WAR: 1931-1939. By Gabriel Jackson. Princeton University Press. 578 pp. $12.50.

Jose Yglesias

In the preface to this superb history of the second Spanish Republic, Gabriel Jackson writes of the Civil War which displaced it: "An entire generation of Englishmen and Americans felt a deeper emotional involvement in that war than in any other world event of their lifetimes, including the Second World War." One of the results of this phenomenon is the many books written on the Civil War whose main concern, Jackson briefly explains, is to place the event in the international context, and he goes on to point out the need for a history of the Republic and the Civil War — inseparable events — from within Spain.

The following pages brilliantly fill this need: there is no better history of the period, and this subject, which has been so pulled apart by passions and recriminations, comes into focus again in Jackson's hands. The controlling, ordering elements are Jackson's own unwavering liberal democratic views and a narrative ability, perhaps matched only among contemporary historians by C. V. Wedgwood. There are good and historical reasons for the ideological disequilibrium which has beset us all—with the exception, perhaps, of reactionaries and Fascists—even before the Spanish Civil War came to a close, and this is so much the case that many people welcomed as a corrective the neutral façade of Hugh Thomas' The Spanish Civil War. In the process, the Spanish people, to whom the glory and the suffering belong, have almost been forgotten: the refusal of many to visit Spain today as a gesture of vestigial loyalty to the cause which once united almost all men of good will is one element of that slighting response to the tragedy. Fortunately, Jackson is not neutral; his insistence on keeping the Civil War in the Spanish context is a true corrective and, breaking the bounds of his intentions, brings order to our passions and disputes.

In the summer of 1936, in Spain, all the political forces current in the Western world — from clerical reaction and contemporary fascism to bourgeois democracy and communism —took the stage for a dramatic confrontation which has nowhere been duplicated. We tend, each with our particular political program, to pick at it as at a laboratory experiment which, somehow, went wrong, forgetting that Spain existed not for our sakes but for its own, that those forces all arose in Spain and worked out their destinies there. This is not an academic notion but one which helps correct misapprehensions and misinterpretations. To take one example, Jackson restores to Juan Negrín, the last Prime Minister of the Republic, his rightful stature by showing that he was the expression, among Socialists and the Spanish people, of the will to fight while a chance existed; whereas in the last twenty-five years, Negrín has come to represent to some of those for whom the war was an international struggle, the dupe of the Kremlin for which, according to this particular group, there was some advantage in the Republic's never surrendering. As corollary, Jackson correctly, but without slander, defines Prieto and other right-wing Socialist leaders as defeatists. Inside Spain, then as well as now, these are the roles these men played according to Spaniards fighting Franco.

The non-Spaniards, to take another example, have always floundered at the spectacle of the inhuman warfare that the Nationalist Army waged. Those to whom the clichés about the cruelty of all Spaniards were unpalatable have found an explanation in the tremendous numbers of Moors, Italians and Germans who made up Franco's army. Yet it is a fact that many Italian officers, and Germans too, were amazed at the policy of the Spanish generals. Jackson—who, let it immediately be said, indulges in none of the traditional generalizations about the Spanish character which is the mark of the amateur writing on Spain—faces this question when describing the advance of the Army of Africa through Andalucia during the first three months of the war. Knowing Spain's contemporary class co flicts, Jackson convincingly states "No category of human beings ar more cruel than a threatened rulin class . . . which finds itself challenge by an inchoate mass which will n longer recognize its privileges." An knowing Spain's colonial history, adds "The Popular Front zone was the r bellious colonial area to be reduced It was, of course, the colonial rule without national identification wit the land he coveted, who allowed th Germans to test their theories of a warfare, gave Mussolini's army chance at spurious glory, and broug in the traditional enemy, the Moor to "save Spain."

It is not entirely, of cours the frame he has chosen that mak Jackson's history the best one avai able, for he knows that the Republ fell because of the intervention Germany and Italy, the enmity England, the cowardice of France, ar the neutrality of the United States. is his compassion and his genero democratic views, analogous to wh was best in the Republican leadershi that buttress his account at almo every turn. The unsatisfactory versio of the Civil War to be gotten fro Hugh Thomas' The Spanish Civil W and Eléna de la Souchère's Explan tion of Spain, to take two importa books of recent years which overl with Jackson's, suffer, in Thom case, from a neutral attitude and, de la Souchère's, though she is Frenc from the stance of the right-wi Spanish Socialists with whom s has worked. chists'; de la Souchère, writing in 64 long after Thomas' book, still peats the story about La Pasionaria fact but says nothing about Casas Quiroga in order to make the mmunists alone responsible, a ver-n with little relation to truth but e which suits the right-wing Social-s in Toulouse. Jackson not only als simply with facts, dismissing does Thomas, the Prime Minister's reat and not bothering with the sproved rumor about La Pasionaria, t is the only one to discuss the ntent of the Prime Minister's and lvo Sotelo's speeches, which is, of urse, the historical point at issue.

It is easy to discredit de la Sou-ère's arguments; for the average nerican reader one has only to ate that she holds a partisan political int of view. But Thomas, who pre-nds to be neutral, and consequently jective, commands great appeal, ce these qualities are generally con-dered admirable in a historian. Neu-ality is, instead, a pitfall: neutral omas is at the mercy of every way-ard fact and tall story, so that his erwritten book becomes, at times, dense thicket. It takes assiduous ecking of his footnotes to find out at by page 173, where he accepts e Fascist figures for the number of urders in Republican territory, he s already used Fascist sources at ast forty times: General Cause or a Cruzada, the official white paper nd the official history published, both cases, by the Franco regime. ne begins to suspect that Thomas' eutrality is as true as that of the ory government during the war.

This is not the place for an analysis f Thomas' book, but it is necessary consider it in order to describe the rtues of Jackson's. Jackson is not eutral, and he has not written his ok to expound a point of view, for ere is a minimum of theorizing in and his liberal sympathies are im-licit in his narrative. But within his oint of view he maintains an ob-ctivity with admirable rigor; un-ke de la Souchère, he does not select r omit at will, but meets every prob-m head on. The question of the num-er of murders on the Republican ide he reserves for a chapter in the ppendix, and it is instructive to com-are the careful judgment he arrives t with the blithe account Thomas ives. In fact, Jackson's subsidiary xplanations are always a pleasure: is footnotes are a way of taking the eader into his confidence and in-olving him further in the narrative, not a game of one-upmanship or an onerous burden the reader comes to feel he must shoulder if he is to be "serious."

And, finally, Jackson also convinces by his style. He is always lucid and disarmingly simple, and one comes to believe that there is not a turgid, overextended sentence in the book because he never overreaches his facts. When he makes a judgment, consequently, it seems usually a felicitous expression of fact. On page 7, describing Alfonso XIII's dropping of the dictator Primo de Rivera, he says of the King, "always agile but never generous," so perfectly characterizing this monarch that one is tempted to give Jackson carte blanche for the rest of the book. It is a style that stands him in good stead: its clarity and his architectural sense of the configuration of events make prosaic periods interesting — such as the economic and political problems of the young Republic — and dramatic events, such as the assault on Madrid, quietly moving.

But every point of view seems to have its limits. If his frame — the view of the Civil War from within Spain — seems to narrow the discussion of the colonial aspect of the war by not going further into its significance for Germany and Italy, so does his implicit view of the uses of historical writing somewhat seal off the subject from the present day. I say somewhat because he does often draw analogies, as in the case, again, of the colonial character of the war, when he compares the treatment of the conquered areas with what has occurred in Algeria and the Congo. His point of view, which could be telescoped into the cliché of "bourgeois liberal," does not allow him to describe, say, the program of the Trotskyist POUM in more than a fair, sober and balanced way; I do not expect him to point to its relevance for the revolutionary Left in colonial countries where it is an important issue today, but it would be illuminating to consider why in Spain it has become the line of most leaders of the widespread student movement. Or why, within Spain, the left-wing parties have again come to the stance of working together as in 1936, and why some followers of the rightist Gil Robles have today evolved into the clandestine Christian Democrats who join the Left on many issues — while abroad the old leaders continue their sterile recriminations.

And, also, there are his anti-Communist assumptions. When he sticks to his tenet that "a historian must deal strictly with what happened," he is always fair, but on occasion he makes an unsupported judgment: the worst, perhaps, that the Spaniards were "the only Western European people to suffer directly the cynical Communist exploitation of the Popular Front ideal." It would have been important here to separate the tactical policies of the Stalinist leaders—and even their crimes, such as the illegal jails they maintained — from the major aims of the Communist movement: the Popular Front ideal was, after all, initiated by Dimitrov and "cynical exploitation" can simply mean that the Communists had socialism up their sleeves, something neither they nor the Socialists ever made any bones about. One could just as easily say, from their point of view, that the Left Republicans cynically exploited the fighting courage of the Communists to maintain a bourgeois capitalist democracy. We cannot do justice here to the damage done by the automatically anti-Communist response (see Christopher Lasch's "New Curriculum

For Teach-Ins," The Nation, October 18) and in Jackson's book it appears as an echo, not a thesis. Nor do I expect that Jackson, were he to agree with me, could reverse the process with his book, for it would take him far afield. But an effort must be made.

Another assumption Jackson makes is that the United States policy was simply one of neutrality, though in relating facts he is careful to state that Texaco was allowed to switch its supply of oil from the Republic to the Fascists. Were Jackson to question his own assumption about the Communists he would have come to the conclusion that the Communist leaders lied to their followers about some of their policies and actions. Were he to question his assumption about our neutrality he would have come to the conclusion that Roosevelt and Stimson and Hull lied to the American people about neutrality, that they never admitted, as they did to Bowers when he returned from his ambassadorial mission in Spain, that they had made a mistake. But the Communists fought for the Republic and met most nobly in the final defense of Madrid the consequences of their policy, whereas our opportunism in relation to Spain continues to this day.

These are important matters for a book on the Republic to deal with, and it is a tribute to Jackson that his book raises such questions: in a sense, his story is the explication of why a whole generation "felt a deeper emotional involvement in that war than in any other event of their lifetimes," and one sometimes wishes he had not confined this argument to the book's preface for, briefly stated, it can seem to a younger generation, as it did to one reviewer, hyperbole. We were all —from plain democrats to capital-C Communists—defeated in that war, and it is an unacceptable ending. The resolution of the Republic's defeat, thus, became the touchstone for the politics of the following decades: we began to doubt the aims of the anti-Nazi war when the 50,000 Republicans in the Maquis were not allowed to cross the border and tumble the Franco regime.

> *The Civil War, too, had a positive meaning which with time will transcend the suffering and destruction which were its immediate consequences. A Wounded Generation

Ana María Matute

The all-encompassing title of this article requires qualification since I am able to discuss only a small but, in my opinion, representative group of authors — friends with whom I have lived, struggled, hoped, and with whom I feel deep ties of brotherhood. I am not a critic or a professor; therefore, I am not going to judge them because I am too close and because I am one of them. I plan, then, to talk about a group of boys with whom I grew up during a cruel Spanish Civil War. I can discuss only those who remained in Spain after the fighting because I lack the personal knowledge of their environment as writers to relate myself to the authors who were forced by circumstances to leave their homeland. I must look back to the childhood, the adolescence, of those writers: to the childhood which hounded them and is present in almost all the works of those of us who were children on that July 18, 1936, in Spain.

The Civil War was a decisive wound which marked forever my life as a writer, and the lives of all other Spanish writers of my generation. W

Height

I fear to take a step; along the edge
Of this precipice on which we balance, bearing our burdens, Fingers appear, clutching; they are the climbers
From below, as we were, to this ample ledge.

May be when we go higher, on to some plateau Filled with flowers, we will stoop and reach Down to their hands as once one stooped to ours.
But now I fear to step, to see the faces
Of those who take the fingers under their heels.

THE SECRET WAR AGAINST HITLER was fought by the German resistance movement from the very beginning. The men at the heart of this resistance were all but wiped out. This is their story—told by Fabian von Schlabrendorff—one who survived. Foreword by JOHN J. McCLOY

*"The tale is fascinating, not only as foreign intrigue but as a chance for the reader to guess what life under Nazism was like."—The New Yorker

"One of the authentic and persistent heroes of the Resistance is Fabian von Schlabrendorff, the author of this book."
—John J. McCloy, former U.S. High Commissioner in Germany

"THE SECRET WAR AGAINST HITLER is a valuable, excellent, and very readable memoir of the resistance movement. It will stand out among the many books that have appeared recently about the Nazi era."

sectors or tendencies of Spanish life of that time. I merely want to explain the facts and circumstances which define the attitudes of the generation of that handful of children precociously bewildered by the world. That group of children could never again be credulous, lacking in curiosity, or feel themselves in that privileged condition for which we had been prepared. Here, I believe, is the root of our literary vocation. In those boys the seed had germinated and nothing could kill it. They learned to think for themselves. They grew into questioning, nonconforming adolescents.

We witnessed yet another transformation—that change which years later in his book, The Ditch, Alfonso Grosso called, "the horrors of peace":

> In place of grenades, food: in place of men, living or dead, food. Food, food of any kind. Food, to be eaten together by the conquerors and the conquered of a city which sooner or later would beat with the pulse of peace, the first horrors of peace; without cannon or alarms, only the shots against the wall at dawn, and hardly anything to eat.

After the experience of war we were able to understand the great lesson of words not uttered, of bitten-off cries, and the great, dull silence of the increasingly oppressive gag over thousands of mouths, ears, eyes and, finally, over thoughts. Perhaps that group of incipient adolescent writers who wrote in search of a road to truth in a vast sea of myths and shadows, of mirages and blindness—a road on which to shout their opposition, their hopes and their still unanswered questions—should be called the group which hurled itself—we splattered ourselves—against silence. A silence dressed in indifference, in a world which suffocated itself in cotton. A world which covered its ears and eyes, and which neither shouted nor whispered, but only repeated.

We searched. We went down to the docks, to the slums, to the shanty towns, to the taverns. We sought the pulse and the heart of the people; we needed their words.

We grew up in difficult times for Spanish writers. The Spanish novel of those days could reflect nothing but a spurious hero or the definitive triumph of decency over indecency, of the angels over the demons: the "good guys" and the "bad guys" once again, as in the tales of our childhood.

We brought to the novel a new criterion. When we referred to the war, we simply called it the Civil War instead of the Glorious Uprising, or the Holy Crusade. But that was censored. So were words like liberty. There were certain relevant "taboos" in Spain. In the novels written in that epoch, no one, for example, committed suicide or adultery.

Those of us who were then 18 or 20 began to write in this suffocating environment. It was difficult. For five or ten years we were the rebellious children whom time would defeat and who were to be treated with a heavy hand. We struggled, but our worst enemy was not the open criticism, nor even the censor. It was the surrounding stupor, it was the indifference and disdain for anything literary or intellectual. No one read. No one was interested in literature. Most foreign books were prohibited by the censor, and even the majorit of Spanish and foreign classics we expurgated. But we wanted to writ not for escape or for pleasure, but denounce.

I remember how we wrote, our di covery of forbidden books in the bac of certain bookstores, our discove of new names, of new literary tende cies, in the shelter of silence, alwa silence. A Little Battle American correspondents in Spain are often so heartened by announced liberalization measures of the Franco regime that continuance of its authoritarian strictures, which is the real story, tends to be overlooked. No note has been taken of the cancellation of a scheduled concert by Raimón, a young Valencian singer whose talents and following are roughly analogous to those of our Bob Dylan. His songs draw on folk and rock-and-roll rhythms, and his lyrics, in Valencian Catalan, are undisguised social protest. That all last winter he held concerts and his recordings were widely circulated was an example of another anomalous development in Spain's cultural life. By spring, however, the regime had caught up with it: no single new recording or concert performance was approved by the censorship, a situation which, without publicity, continued through the summer.

We have been in correspondence with one of his student followers, a young man who describes himself as a Left Socialist. (Raimón is something of an idol of Spain's New Left. They see in his success a victory for free expression as well as a particular gain for the Valencian-Catalan nationalist movement, since to sing in the Catalan language is in itself a form of protest.) A concert in Madrid had been approved for November 1. The day after its announcement all seats were sold out. Shortly thereafter the student wrote:

"I had already told you that the concert was taking place and all seats were sold out. . . . We'd won, we thought, a little battle. Our own kind of left-wing point of view had gained entré in Madrid. We were accepted. This fact, as symbol of our present sad position, had importance. Real importance for us!

"But we weren't able to win this little battle. We couldn't win it because we couldn't wage it. I was with Raimón the night, just a few days before the concert, when he got the call: the Minister himself—Fraga Iribarne—had just cancelled Raimón's appearance. But Raimón went to Madrid. And sang; he sang at the university, high schools, and at the UNESCO Club. At the club there was already an overflow audience two hours before his arrival. A thousand people sat in the street outside waiting for him. A demonstration was attempted. And that's when we had our little battle, after all, a tiny little battle. It ended with his being again prohibited from performing and with the deployment of numerous armed jeeps. In my country, everything ends like this, under a gray sky the same color as the uniform of the police."

a way of seeing, vision itself. But the brilliance of what was revealed hurt us; and we were cut off from it, suddenly and brutally. We were surrounded only by echoes, distant rumblings. The words "liberty" and "the rights of man" were torn from our writings and erased from our program. And social justice, that justice for which we were clamoring, they changed to the word "charity."

But that memory of war to which we turned our eyes with increasing insistence brought us names. Our generation grew without writers to emulate. As an example of the arbitrariness of these prohibitions, Dostoevski was forbidden almost entirely, as were Balzac and Anna Karenina —or they were mutilated. Almost all the contemporary writers of France, Italy and the United States were forbidden. Also prohibited were our own Baroja, Valle Inclán, Ortega y Gasset, a large portion of Unamuno and Clarín, not to mention the work of those who were forced to leave the country for political reasons.

The silence increased, extended, and the youth, our friends, their backs turned to ideas, became excited only over football. The young people did not talk about literature or politics: they did not even know what it meant. I remember how we sought one another out and found ourselves. Our enthusiastic discussions, our fellowship, our seeking one another's hand blindly in the midst of the hermetic and scornful environment. We did not exist. The few who read us either scolded us or treated us indulgently; we were the enfants terribles whom time would subdue. We would grow and turn to "normal" literature and to "normal" ways.

The official censor was no worse than that other censor, those people who would write letters to the editor saying: "Don't give those disagreeable writers access to your magazine. When I drive up to my home in my Fiat "600" and get ready for my coffee, I sit down and read your weekly, and then the misery of other people comes right into my home. I don't want to know about all that, I just want to live in peace." At least we were breaking the terrible apathy, and moving something, a conscience, an indignation, a comfortableness. They attacked us, they forbade us, but by doing so they affirmed our existence. We were saying something, we shouted for something, and they began to hear us.

Around us the awakening was slow. The wound of the war was still open and the consequences of that wound were still throbbing. The young writers no longer wrote about fraudulent heroes with whom the man in the street found it hard to identify, the man who struggled in a daily state of siege with life's difficulties. We still had our frank curiosity, our lack of conformity and the desire for social justice. We could no longer be satisfied with their ambiguous word: "charity." Charity on Sunday afternoon, with formulas to quiet their conscience and to elude incontrovertible duties. We still asked Why? We wrote about the men and women who did not have time to think about their psyches because they were hungry, poor, worked twelve or fourteen hours a day, and didn't know how to read or write. Except for writers like Camilo José Cela or Miguel Delibes the traditional novel still focused on stale and petty problems. A new wind swept away these pedantic, strictly stylistic preoccupations, as the wind sweeps papers from a vacant lot.

The memory of the war throbbed in those who were only 10 in July, 1936. That memory, that possibility which made Armando López Salinas write in The Mine, twenty years later, of a conversation between two farm hands who were fruitlessly looking for a day's work in the fields of Andalusia:

> . . . Have you never seen a town shouting in the streets, giving long life to liberty? I'll never forget it. The people milled through the streets hugging each other. They put the flag up on the town hall without firing a shot. That came later. Everything went to pot; they killed my father and my brother in the middle of the street. . . .
> Once I heard about dividing the land among the poor, but that was too good to be true. In any case it was a good idea, they had us at heart. One lives on hope. Then everything went to hell.

Jesús Fernández Santos, in his marvelous book, Shaved Head, a series of short stories about the Spanish Civil War, presents, perhaps better than anyone, the sensations of the child who is bewildered and curious as he faces the exodus of families fleeing bombardments around Madrid, the constant sensation of fleeing. The curiosity of those children who run toward the unknown, the sensation of something different happening in their lives, something not in accord with the explanations of their parents. One story, "Far from Madrid," provides these sensations of flight and discovery:

> Ever since the front line had cut the railroad, leaving the father on the other side, the three — the mother and the two children—were retreating, further and further, listening to the orders to evacuate. The days passed in rapid succession, like the towns, the trains filled with soldiers, the new control officers that each morning brought. White lonely villages. Impassive old people, unknown children, looking without greeting, sitting or squatting at the edge of the road. The plains, burning mesas, undulated with the convoy and were left behind unnoticed. Razed churches. Fountains which still flowed, lonely and silently; but above all, the silence of the people, their hostile manner, wary, the fear of the war. And with fear, excitement, the unexpected every day. . . .

And in the short story, "Cousin Rafael," the curiosity of children going out to play and running toward the abandoned trenches to discover, for the first time, the body of a dead soldier. He writes with all the surprise and horror of those children:

> He ducked down in the trench again, examining the bottom. The younger boy looked up at the resinous trunks of the trees. . . . He could see the boiling surge of ants, hundreds of them, always moving in the same direction. They seemed to converge on some dwarf pines, clumped under a larger truncated one. They asked each other what that dark immobile shape was that blackened the foot of its trunk. Suddenly the wind stopped rustling in the pines and a penetrating odor seemed to filter into their very bones. He ran down the hill ahead of cousin Rafael who followed frightened, stumbling, scratching his legs and arms. "Shut up. They'll hear you. They'll hear you down at the house." But he could only cry. More and more. His whole body was excited. The frightened older boy said: "It was a dog. A burned dog. . . ." "No, no. . . . I saw it. I saw it first, right away. . . . No," repeated the smaller boy. He remembered it well. He remembered the legs were intact—they had not burned—and the twisted, unbuttoned boots.

Impelled by curiosity, these boys of Fernández Santos, though panic-stricken, run to uncover the unknown. The sensation that something was happening, something big, atrocious, different. A world opens up and one has to know what it is, without blinking, even unto the depths of horror. Perhaps as a possibility of salvation. Again, in the story, "The End of the War," the sensation of something lost, defeated, dark and obscure, floats on these pages:

> Distant, single firing would once in a while bring back the memory of a war in which no one, sheltered in the pines, had managed to take part. Only changes of front lines, different trenches with the same dirty parapets, boring changes of the guard, and a long unsatisfied hunger . . . rumors of surrender, of nightly desertions.

In his novel, El Jarama, Ferlosio Sánchez pictures youth with its back turned, cloistered youth that did not know the war. A conforming, unfulfilled, unworried youth. There is a moment in which this youth that followed us turned its eyes back to the war:

> "In the war I believe there were a lot of people killed on this very river." "Yes, further up in Paracuellos of the Jarama they had some of the worst fighting, but the line went all along the river, even to Titulcia." "Titulcia?" "Haven't you ever heard of it? An uncle of mine fell during the offensive right in the town. That's how I know about it." Mely said, "Just think, this was the front and there were so many killed, and we were swimming so peacefully, just as if nothing had happened." "Probably there was a cadaver right where you put your foot." Lucita interrupted, "That's enough! Why bring these things up now?" The other three came back. Miguel said, "What were you talking about?" "Nothing, Lucita doesn't like stories about the dead." "What dead?" "Those killed in the war." "Oh! . . . those, by the way, what time is it?"

Antonio Ferres, in one brief phras of his novel, The Squad, sums u this sensation when one of the me who is building a hut in a slum Madrid says:

> "Don't you have any parents?' "A grenade got them during th war and someone pulled me out o the ruins. I am twenty years old All I have left from the war is this.' Luis pointed to a scar on his lef cheek. "Only that?" said the other

We all look back to the war; f a page, a sentence, a word; alwa our eyes turn to the war. We did n have a miserable childhood, nor we we hungry; but in spite of the fa of being middle class, we are n content. We write, many years aft the end of the war, because we a not happy and because we do n conform. Nor are we sleeping, bli or dead. We write because writing a form of protest: a protest while have life and strength against that represents oppression, hypocri and injustice.

A survivor's story, The Painted Bird, belongs to that 20th-century genre which teaches us that our daily and clear, comforting separation of "real" experience from nightmare, of obj tive event from the sequestered ma man's fantasy is neither natural n enduring; human life under the ru of reason, of something like char and love, is life under a special d pensation, a lucky historical accide limited, a luxury. From the surviv out of the Polish villages we can lea again what—drifting down aisles a mass-discount-comfort culture a in spite of riots and demonstrations we may try to forget; human life, t cheapest thing there is, can be ma tained and has been for centuries the midst of chaos, brutality, organiz and disorganized ill will.

The other genre to which this s vivor's tale must, I think, be linked a good deal older. We know this st and these actors, have them in bones, although we have usually n them in symbolic, more bearable, ferently fictionalized and selected tail: Hansel and Gretel in the witc hut; "The Poor Boy in the Grav

oy of 6—a child who looks like a fter the foster mother's sudden eath, the story becomes a nightmar-h, blow-by-blow account of the child's artly passive, learning-to-struggle sur-val: the blows are literal, of course, r clubs and whips and switches and dgels and flails are the ordinary nplements of peasant life. The child

yes, his Jewish or gypsy "otherness";

ng or child of darkness. Defined by is darkness alone, and powerless ithout goods or protectors, he is tol-rated, exploited, tortured, not quite urdered, forgotten in good seasons, ut blamed for bad.

The various episodes, no doubt based on experience, seem to embody and play on recognizable folk-tale motifs, always with that "realistic" twist, or reversal, which shows that there is neither justice, nor reason, nor black or white magic to help one in extremity. Only chance. When the foster mother, a passable witch, burns with her hut, the child is not restored to joyful parents—though here, in the first episode, he fully expects to be. Foundlings and strangers are not given bed and board by the poor because they are our Lord in disguise, or may have three wishes to dispense. They are Jews to be misused and turned over to the German ovens. The bird catcher and his beloved are not noble youth and maid but aging, half-mad outcasts who—instead of turning into birds or a flowering bush—are ultimately kicked to death by the other peasants; goats do not turn into princes although peasant girls may love them; the crucifix does not speak, miraculously, for the innocent; to be held under ice or to be thrown into and nearly drowned in a manure pit does not, like the fairy-tale fall-down-the-well, lead to a gentler, magic country but only to the hero's emergence into more cruel trials; the huntsman who is ordered to perform the ritual killing is, interestingly enough, a German soldier who allows the boy to escape. The narrator does not marry the king's daughter after his trials: for a while at least he "marries" the Red Army, whose soldiers rescue him. With the Russian soldiers he is given the change of clothing so important in folk tales for change of identity: not princely garments, but a uniform and a Red Star. Finally, restored by means of the traditional identifying birthmark to his parents, the boy enters not the "happily ever after," but that complex disorganized postwar society, in which ultimately even the saving hagiography of Stalin as protective, hard-working Father, and the ideal of a rational Collective will turn out disproved fairy tales.

The book's epilogue, however, attempts to reverse the bitterly ironic anti-fairy-tale pattern: in what seems to me an odd reversal, Mr. Kosinski finds that the freedom and independence, which he learned among the peasants, were subject only to "the limits of his own determination and skill." He implies that America today may be a comparable, fit habitat for the man determined to survive and spread his wings. We may nevertheless hope for a world less natural, less governed by accident, inherited fear, superstition and the brutality that is no one's fault because it has always existed: I mean, a society less traditional, perhaps, in which even those of the wrong color can survive with a less heroic effort of skill and determination, and with less reliance on their luck.

VARESE

In the few days that have passed since the death of Edgard Varèse, no thought about music could be far from the sharp awareness of what it has meant to us and to music that he lived and composed. One suddenly became conscious that an essential part of every sonic experience in our musical lives was in some way shaped for us by the encounter with Varèse, by what his music taught us and enabled us to hear. At the concert given by the Columbia Group for Contemporary Music two days after he died, Harvey Sollberger's gesture in playing the Density 21.5 in Varèse's memory was almost superfluous; for his memory was alive in every aspect of the program that had been previously scheduled. The activity itself was a descendant of Varèse's pioneer efforts with the International Composers' Guild at a harsh and lonely time for advanced music in America. The early music on the program recalled Varèse's own days as a choral conductor and his lifelong impatience with the limitations of modern "tempered" tuning. In the Boulez Mallarmé Improvisation No. 2, the isolated clusters of timbrally striking sound events recalled a quality first revealed as a fundamental articulative resource by Varèse. Milton Babbitt's live-electronic Vision and Prayer not only recalled that Varèse dreamed of electro-acoustic means of sound production and control long before anyone else had even conceived of their possibility, but also that even this pre-eminently pitch music of Babbitt, with its sonic restraint and continuous unfolding, is nonetheless steeped in the dimension of spatial articulation that was another of Varèse's great discoveries. The idea is so fundamentally embedded in the electronic medium with its characteristic multiple sound sources that it is astonishing to realize that Varèse first conceived and successfully projected it with conventional instruments. And finally, the sharp separation of sound levels in Charles Wuorinen's new Chamber Concerto for oboe and ten players was, despite the work's undeniable originality and compositional sophistication, obviously composed out of the powerful experience of Varèse's work.

But perhaps the most impressive evidence of Varèse's continuing vitality for our musical lives has been the remarkable impact and excitement that his own music still generates in performance. Despite the paucity of works (he destroyed some early pieces, and a fire destroyed many others; later, he abandoned composition for almost twenty years out of the bitt realization that under the then pr vailing conditions his works cou never be adequately played), and d spite the fact that most of these wor their composer was well over 80, t younger generation of composers, pe formers and listeners has found them the same kind of contempora

indeed, Varèse's music that most c viously required the new virtuosity

it is surely his work that has mo

As a result, no Varèse memor

e's. Whatever we eventually find to y about his work, the one observa- n that has come back again and ain is that of all the really original th-century masters, it was Varèse o conceived and projected a sound at seemed to derive from no pre- us music—as did those of Stravin- y, Schoenberg, and even Webern.

But Varèse's place in our musical es was far more personal as well. s interest in and involvement with New York musical community was unremitting that literally up to the ry last moment his presence was an variable and indispensable aspect of ery important new-music concert. oreover, there is hardly anyone who s ever a young "advanced" com- ser in New York during the past irty years who cannot count among s treasured professional experiences e remarkable sympathy and interest with which Varèse looked at his scores and listened to their performances.

We served on committees with him, we encountered him constantly in the homes of musicians and in his own, and it is indeed true, as The New York Times' editorial obituary so patronizingly noted, that he was loved and revered as a father figure by all of New York's avant-gardes, just as he was a monumental presence to the international artistic community. This, assuredly, is a far truer measure of Varèse's historical position than that "ultimate place in history" invariably invoked to avoid acknowledging the existence of a real musical world of the present. The only history in which we can presume to judge or even be legitimately concerned with Varèse is our own—to what other could he have possibly belonged? And in that history, Varèse's magnificent place is secure.

illiam Alfred, author of Hogan's oat, is reported to have said that e critics told him what the play is out. One may suppose that there as a concealed irony in the state- ent. On the other hand the admis- on may be a clue to a flaw in Mr. lfred's interesting play.

Its theme, according to another re- ark ascribed to the playwright, has do with the "human tendency to ink you can get away with any- ing and take it back"—in a word, tribution. One pays for one's er- rs, no matter how forgivable they ay be. Without being pretentious, e play aims at tragedy. Its failure this respect does not invalidate its erits nor diminish its attractiveness. hat gives the play color and its ecial quality, apart from its writing, its "historical" aspect.

The story concerns the Irish immi- rants in the Brooklyn of 1890. It as a separate town at the time and e dramatic action centers upon the ayoralty fight between two men: atthew Stanton, 37, who had come poor boy from his native land only elve years before, and old Edward uinn, long the incumbent Mayor, a ynical, corrupt, determined politico, pical of old Tammany. It is a truggle for power which Quinn clings because he knows himself to e worthless without it, and which tanton covets in order to make something of himself in America. Stanton is a reform candidate, bent on throwing out the old rascal, but in his hunger for power he is as ruthless as the boss he would replace. The reformer —"house devil and street saint"—is not wholly aware of the poisons which are bred by his drive to win.

The rather complicated and somewhat melodramatically old-fashioned plot concerns Aggie Hogan, first Quinn's mistress, then Stanton's. (On this account Stanton has come to be nicknamed "Hogan's Goat.") Believing her to have been unfaithful, Stanton abandons Aggie whom he has secretly married. He hides this fact, goes to London for a while where he marries a well-born Irish girl and returns with her to Brooklyn. She feels herself exiled amid the roughs and toughs in her new home and suffers a sharp sense of guilt because she was married only by civil law.

On the basis of this past history Quinn is able to frustrate his rival's bid for power, but not until Stanton, to prevent his wife from leaving him (she has learned of his unavowed marriage), pushes her down a flight of stairs. This leads to her death, his arrest and to Quinn's ultimate defeat because of his connection with the scandal.

In writing his play, Mr. Alfred seems to have been impelled by various ambitions. To begin with, the above-stated intention is implied in such lines as "There are some things in life you can't take back"—the plot consequence of which is that not only the sinner but also the innocent are destroyed. Concomitant with this thought is the idea that in the quest for power lie the seeds of crime.

Further, the author wished to recreate the Irish Brooklyn of old with its mixture of religiosity, ignorance, provincial charm, fecklessness and brutality—the sweetly rancid festering of our ghettos in their growth and in their dissolution. Finally there is the purely literary striving (Mr. Alfred is a professor of English at Harvard) to envelop and elevate all this material through the use of modern verse forms, language which makes poetic patterns of the vernacular.

These several motivations do not altogether coalesce in Hogan's Goat. The play is diffuse; it imparts a sense of riding on different tracks to a destination which may be important but which is never reached. Though the characters are ably and often engagingly drawn—notably the crusty monster Quinn—none of them has sufficient size or originality to confer tragic dimension. The plot is "pushed" to make its point, and the point, being extremely serious, is not acceptable on the basis of the play's contrivance. One becomes stubborn in such cases, saying to oneself: "I know that what is being said is supposed to be a religious verity, but since it has been demonstrated through patent artifice I refuse to believe or be moved by it."

Still something remains which holds our attention and commands respect. Though the surface is conventional (there are certain old plays and recent novels about similar situations), we are persuaded that we are seeing not simply a story of the Irish in old Brooklyn but a part of the social history that shaped us. We seem to witness the development of our cities through talent, energy, industry, rascality, fraud and idealism. The play not only tells us about those crooks of occasional genius who built the metropolises; it makes us feel and understand them. The American past, nearly always travestied in Hollywood, is rarely used with authentic sensibility on the stage. Our drama seems to have no background in history before 1912 at the earliest. Plays written about us before that time were in virtually all instances even more bogus than the films.

The verse used in Hogan's Goat gratifies the ear and, on the whole, convinces as a fitting theatrical medium. The gap between the kind of metaphors and images employed and the characters who speak them is not wide enough to be discomfiting. The happiest touches are short phrases, bits of picturesque insult and homely quips. Except for a speech describing the immigrants' voyage to America in steerage, the sustained passages are less telling. There are flights of rhetoric which either are false to character in their dramatic context, or sound as if the author were taking time out to prove himself a poet. T artistic laxity results in techni awkwardness.

One is scrupulous in noting th faults because it is not enough in case of a fundamentally worth-wh effort by a gifted new writer to joice that he has achieved somethi of a hit, that he has added to support of such an undertaking The American Place Theatre—wh last season brought us Robert Lowe The Old Glory. One must regard event as a hearty step in a diffic course which demands critical st ture as well as encouragement.

The play is aptly staged and p duced in direction by Frederick R and in scenic investiture by K Lundell. The company as a whole very well cast in regard to type; acting makes a generally favora impression ranging from the amia stock to the commendably adequ and mounting in excellence to chaele Myers' performance, touch and humorous, as a neighborh bawd.

the K.K.K. investigation, but Mrs. Crane is disingenuous when she attributes the absence of demonstrators to Capitol regulations. The proceedings would assuredly have been livelier if it was her group that was being probed. And with all deference to the Rev. Dr. King, I must stand on my observation that, whatever the inclinations of the subcommittee members, the hearings have not constituted an attack, direct or indirect, on the civil rights movement. As for Mrs. Crane's interpretation of what the Congressmen are deviously trying to accomplish, that bespeaks an overheated imagination; no one outside of her immediate circle believes that this investigation can redeem HUAC in liberal hearts. . . .

I shall not don mourning if the Court finally does put HUAC out of business, but my assignment was to report on what was happening in the caucus room, not to stoke up the hopes of zealous readers.

The homosexual evasion

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your editorial, "Justice for Homosexuals" (Nov. 8), confuses by combining disparate issues. The imperative of "due process" for deviates, as for other offenders, is clear; their human as well as legal rights must be scrupulously honored. But your special pleading for legalizing "homosexual relations between consenting adults" conveys only a plausible f of meaning, in Francis Bacon's phr Citing Learned Hand has becc sheer ritualism; in this area, "Ho nodded," as Hand said of Holmes another context.

The postulate that discretion privacy in the practice of deviant behavior may be the difference tween a wrongful and a lawful ac clearly inadmissible. Can incest or ing with an animal be so immuni against societal disapproval? Le mizing what for centuries have b regarded as abominations is wh outside our moral custom. Law, i is to be viable, must reflect mo And, it has always been one of proper objectives of criminal law reaffirm societal norms in order maintain respect for and the integ of those norms.

To legalize homosexual cond however practiced, is an injustice society's future. Con Ed's string of lights

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: Thank you for the splendid, well-researched article ["Con Edison: The Hudson River Caper," by David Cort, The Nation, Nov. 22] on the battle to save Storm King Mountain at Cornwall-on-Hudson from the controversial pumped-storage electric power plant proposed by Con Edison of New York. The great Northeastern blackout which paralyzed New York just before your article appeared furnished an ironic footnote to this battle.

Immediately after service had been restored to the city, Con Edison's public relations people went to work trying to convince New Yorkers that the Cornwall plant would have prevented the disastrous power failure and helped to restore service faster. Although the company was careful not to make a direct claim, the inference dominated a number of expensive full-page ads placed in newspapers throughout the company's service area and was sold again and again in public statements and on radio.

Considering that New Yorkers will be paying for the cost of this propaganda campaign in their monthly power bills, they ought to have some idea of the accuracy of what they are being sold. . . .

At the moment of the blackout, which occurred very near the peak of highest demand, New York City was using 4.3 million kilowatts of power, according to available reports. If all of Con Edison's power plants had been in operation, the city would have had a capacity of 7.6 million kilowatts, leaving a margin of safety of 3.3 million kilowatts. As it was, three of the company's plants were down for various reasons and the capacity was 6.1 million kilowatts, leaving a margin of safety of 1.8 million kilowatts. There is no question that 1.8 million kilowatts was more than adequate to handle any foreseeable demand of the city for power.

If Con Edison had pulled the switch and disconnected itself from the failing power grid, there would have been no blackout in New York City.

Now what would have happened if the Cornwall plant had been available? First, the failure in the grid was great enough to eat up the city's 1.8 million kilowatt surplus as though it wasn't there at all. I have not yet seen figures on the total demand, but it is clear from the extent and effect of the failure that it would also have exceeded Cornwall's 2 million kilowatt capacity, assuming that the full capacity was available. Thus, under the most favorable circumstances, the Con Edison system would have been thrown out even with Cornwall, unless the company disconnected from the failing Northeast power grid.

The key to maintaining New York's power was cutting free of the grid and Con Edison had more than enough power to do that and maintain service without Cornwall power. . . .

The antiquated Con Edison system appears to be the real reason that the company took so long getting power back to its captive customers in New York. The Con Edison distribution system has been likened to the old-fashioned string of Christmas tree lights, all connected in series. When one light blows, the whole string goes, and the only way to get it back in service is to check each light. Public Service of New Jersey was offering Con Edison lots of power from its modern jet turbines right after the failure, but Con Edison couldn't accept it until they had gone through their whole system and gotten the plants ready to take it. There were literally thousands of break points that had to be manually operated, using every available man. In short, there was an abundance of power available to help stricken New York, but Con Edison couldn't use it. . . .

Why would a discussion about military budget lead to questions not al-

andor, Credibility, Confidence

Open covenants, openly arrived at, were never any- ng more than a figment of Woodrow Wilson's agination; moreover, while a war is being fought, lomatic moves are apt to be even more tortuous an the deals that are worked out afterward. Each e is intent on winning at the conference table the al victory which eluded it on the battlefield — or, defeat is its portion, on obtaining terms which will able it to fare better in the wars to come.

Accordingly, the normal behavior of governments quires pulling the wool over the eyes of its own al citizens (including those who are fighting and ng) as well as those of allies and neutrals. The ent to which the Johnson Administration has suc- ded in this endeavor is perhaps unequaled in his- y. Under President Kennedy there were complaints management of the news but, as we can see now, s was all on a relatively ineffectual scale. The techques of feeding misinformation to the loyal Ameri- n have been greatly refined since that time, and he takes at face value anything that he reads (with few exceptions) in the commercial press, or sees d hears on his electronic equipment, he must be llfully gullible.

The revelations of the past few weeks have horri- d even some of the most experienced manipulators public opinion. "I feel as if I have been cuckolded," e newspaper editor exclaimed. Sen. Richard Russell, ng a confidant of the President, reflected on the mmunications between U Thant and Adlai Steven- n and on the Hanoi offer in the early fall of 1964 discuss a possible settlement, and concluded that grievous error was committed." Such expressions resentment have been coming from every side; en the war hawks, who now call for the bombing Hanoi and Haiphong, feel that the total lack of ndor in the Administration's pronouncements is f-defeating. Official lying works for a time, but hen the curtain of secrecy is momentarily pulled de the revelations are all the more damaging.

The details that have leaked out -- about the sup- ssion of the fact that overtures for possible nego- tions were made more than a year ago, about the nerican role in the Dominican Republic, about U. S. clear-tipped weapons in the possession of the West rmans—lead to the question: can this Administra- n ever be believed again? The doubts are redoubled the stupid and transparent falsehoods with which spokesmen try to cover up past machinations while esent ones, we may be sure, continue to be perpetrated. We are told, in one instance, that Dean Rusk led to pass information on to the President. And what grounds? Rusk's "antennae" told him that noi was not "sincere," and we had to get into a ll-scale war before Hanoi's sincerity could be attested. Americans and Vietnamese must die in increasing numbers until Rusk, waving his sensitive antennae toward the Asian mainland, decides that an authentic message of submission is finally being transmitted by the crafty enemy.

The damage has been compounded by the treatment meted out to U Thant, on whom to a large degree rest the chances of peace. In the 1964 Vietnam situation, U Thant was placed in an affair so frustrating that he was forced to signal to the American public that if they only knew the facts they would agree that further bloodshed might be avoided. His reward was to be slapped down by the Administration and by the President himself, as if he were an intruder pushing himself into a situation that did not concern him.

In Mr. Johnson we have a President who plays the cards close to his chest, who wants to run everything and to keep all power in his own hands, who loves secrecy and intrigue for its own sake. In the light of the disclosures which have now reached the American public, the President's oft-repeated assertion that his only wish is to bring the Vietcong and North Vietnam to the conference table requires a closer and more skeptical look.

Less and Less Unconditional

Newsweek (November 29) writes that though the United States is still ready to begin "unconditional discussions" at any time, "the discussions are now less unconditional than they have ever been—and it will take a loud, clear signal from Hanoi to get them started." The offer to discuss, then, is not unconditional at all; in The Nation's view, it never was. The Nation's skepticism was based on the use of the word "discussions" and the careful avoidance of "negotiations"; moreover, by the time of the President's Johns Hopkins speech a strong drumbeat of criticism had to be countered, and a big arms build-up was under way. It seemed fairly obvious that while the Administration might talk peace for domestic consumption, the arms build-up and intensification of the war were its real objectives. The rest was camouflage.

This pattern goes far beyond "negotiation from strength." Our strength is shown by the ratio of Vietcong and North Vietnamese casualties to our own. Unless our opponents obtain matching air power, that ratio will be maintained—or increased. The key figures in the Johnson Administration are banking on massive casualties to bring the North Vietnamese to terms. Rusk is reported to have stressed to a foreign visitor that he was ready to fly to Geneva any time, but he also told the visitor: "We'll lick 'em." In other words, he is ready to go to Geneva to dictate terms of surrender.

He may be disappointed. Any nation—be it European, Asian, or American — pursues victory as long as a few pints of blood remain unshed, and North Vietnam is still far from being bled white. If victory is beyond its grasp, its fighting men will be thrown into the breach to avert negotiation from weakness, which comes close to being no negotiation at all. We knocked down last year's peace feelers because our military position at the time was unsatisfactory and because we feared the effect discussions might have on the government in Saigon. (When Stevenson mentioned this difficulty to U Thant, the latter is said to have replied: "What government?") It is now Hanoi's turn to reason in this fashion, and to counter our passion for "victory" with its own. Everything points, then, to a continuation of the war, to rising casualties and, if matters slip out of control, to a widening and ever more dangerous conflict.

This sequence of events gives the war hawks on our side the leverage they need. In military matters, a kernel of logic always exists within the encompassing illogic, as when General LeMay argues that it is senseless to use B-52s as tactical aircraft. If we are going to use them, why not bomb refineries, tank farms, industries, etc.? Why not — although LeMay has not suggested it so far—bomb population centers, as he bombed Tokyo in World War II? Senator Russell and Representative Rivers, and Richard Nixon, are ready to take the former step right now, and if that fails to work, by all indications they will be prepared to go on to the latter. Moderation has no place in the logic of war.

All this, as The Nation has pointed out time and again, is part of the preventive war against China which is the ulterior reason for our war in Vietnam. The Chinese cannot be under any illusions on that score. What if they have taken the possible elimination of North Vietnam into account? If the Soviets did not intervene, the Chinese would have an unchallenged claim to leadership of the Communist world. They could then retaliate with means of their own choosing, presumably occupation of North Vietnam and operations against South Vietnam from bases in the north. This involves risks for them, but they may be willing to take a chance on having their atom factories bombed if they can engulf us in a protracted land war. They bided their time in Korea; they may be biding their time again. Are we being sucked into the vortex we swore to avoid?

Kennedy's Course

In his present political maneuvers Robert F. Kennedy somewhat resembles the Tower of Pisa, which leans, but not enough to fall over. The soothsayers in Washington see Kennedy veering cautiously to left of center, perhaps less from personal preference than as the only means available to distinguish himself from President Johnson and his entourage. Before leaving for South America he took a stance on American policy in Asia which placed him apart from the war hawks, and now he is differentiating himself from Johnson, Jack Hood Vaughn and Tom Mann in Latin American affairs. The opportunity is enhanced by his ju position to Secretary Rusk, who, colorless as ever, been operating in the same area.

Before leaving on his tour, Kennedy was bri at the State Department. State would rather he stayed home, but since he was bent on going Vau was designated to tell him what to say. Bobby did take kindly to this tutelage. When he was aske explain U. S. intervention in the Dominican Repu to the Latin Americans, he bluntly declined.

At Rio, Rusk announced that we would interv unilaterally to put down subversion in Latin Ame although of course we would prefer to do so at side of our OAS allies. This, coming in the wak the offensive House resolution promulgating a lateral right of intervention, could hardly have more irritating, even to those countries which a matically go along with us. Kennedy backed up Johnson Administration only mildly, saying abou little as he decently could. Wherever possible, he s to students and offered to discuss issues even those most hostile to him. He presented the im of a young man who had little use for armed gu and military men, and had no other wish than to Latin Americans man to man. In short, he represe the Good Neighbor Policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt John F. Kennedy, while Rusk was, in effect, the ponent of what the Latin Americans would regar the new Bad Neighbor Policy.

All this has far-reaching political implication home. Unable to get help from the President, Kennedy is establishing himself as an indepen political figure. It can hardly be doubted that he his eye on the Presidency. It is a long way off, bu is not to be precluded that he may make it.

No Holocaust for V.I.P.s

A few years ago, a priest gave it as his ex opinion that a good Christian would be justifie shooting a neighbor who tried to share his fal shelter, such neighbor having lacked the foresigh or the wherewithal — to provide a sanctuary of own. The resulting burst of bad publicity, with ni mares of weeping children vainly knocking on bo shelter doors, no doubt had something to do with collapse of the boom in private shelter buildin although no small number of well-heeled and handed householders have quietly looked out themselves and their loved ones in this respect. ever, chosen executives of great corporations and favorite subordinates are spared the shelter probl For them, expense-account living will continue out interruption, even while 80 million expend Americans perish.

These pleasant arrangements are described Douglas Sefton in the New York Daily News (No ber 4). In 1951, the Iron Mountain Atomic Sto Corp. began to convert an abandoned mine near son, N.Y., into survival storage space for compa and institutions — presumably from the New opolitan area, although this cannot be verified, the names of tenants are kept in confidence. idea was then extended from records to people, Iron Mountain has become a "20th-century Noah's for several thousand employees of banks, in- nce companies, advertising agencies and every ner of enterprise, including a modeling agency a dance band. Comes the holocaust, these blessed will be sped to their impregnable refuge, nor will be under the harsh necessity of taking up arms nst intruders. he Man Who Tried To Stop e Cold War a longer perspective it should be even clearer it is today that the quintessential historical point ut the career of Henry Agard Wallace was that he d to stop the cold war—and was struck down with e and violence by the Great God Juggernaut. Up he time that he broke with Truman (or perhaps should say when Truman broke with him) over issue, he enjoyed, for excellent reasons, a deep wide respect. He was an exemplary public official, icated, hard-working, incorruptible; a man of intellectual and moral integrity—and everyone knew it. He was a first-rate practical scientist; he laid the groundwork for an agricultural policy which, whatever its limitations, was certainly a success in allaying farm unrest and raising farm income. His food-stamp plan and his "ever normal granary," and his splendid wartime work, marked him as an inventive and able administrator. Aside from the usual captious criticism of any well-known public figure, Wallace enjoyed a wholly admirable reputation—that is, until he tried to stop the cold war. The fact itself, and not its embellishments, is what resulted in his being cast into outer darkness, well beyond the pale which the Establishment reserves for "responsible" (read "kept") dissenters. That he had no sense of tactics or timing, that he was induced to accept some of the worst political advice imaginable, that the form and content of the '48 campaign were faulty in the extreme, none of this is important when measured against the essential fact: he wouldn't go along with the cold war. If his tactics had been brilliant, if his criticism had been sharper, the result would have been exactly the same. He was a moralist, not a politician. It was because people knew that he acted from principle that they regarded his criticism as unforgivable; expediency can always be winked at, but not high moral conduct.

Because Wallace elected to withdraw almost completely from public life after the '48 campaign and devote himself to pursuits he liked much better than politics — breeding varieties of gladioli, strawberries and corn, and improving the production of large-breasted chicken—he made it possible for the Establishment to deal with his death in surprisingly friendly and generous terms. If he had continued his efforts to stop the cold war, the obituaries would have been shorter, the sentiments in the editorials less generous, and the appraisals less objective. The tone of the comment about his career was also influenced by another consideration. In 1948, Wallace saw clearly enough (he had seen it even earlier) that Truman's cold-war policies would lead to war as indeed they did, in 1950. In retrospect it would be hard for any but the most intransigent cold warrior to deny that Wallace was more right than his critics, that the course of events since 1948 has largely confirmed what he had to say about the cold-war policies Truman substituted for the wartime policies of Roosevelt. Not that the time has yet come for such an acknowledgment. Apparently we must fight a few more wars before we are ready to make the admission. But the year is 1965 and we are at war in Vietnam. This latest war, cruel, dirty and shameful, is an outgrowth of the blind pursuit of the same cold-war policies that Wallace opposed. Reading between the lines of the notices about his death, one could hear a small voice saying, "After all, this man just might have been right." But for all his brilliant achievements, Henry Wallace was a "failure" when measured by the American Gospel of Success; imagine a man who would toss away a brilliant career for a principle!

Is the Automobile Incurable

Southern California is to the automobile what Australia is to the rabbit. A pest elsewhere in the country, it has become a plague in the great urban sprawl along the coast and into the desert from Los Angeles. California has fought intelligently and vigorously to control and confine the car, to tame it and to curb its most destructive characteristics. As the two following articles bear witness, the people have won at best a Korean victory over their beast of burden.

And the epidemic begins to spread. Smog, which the rest of the country took some ironic pleasure in identifying with Sunny California, is now coating the throats and blearing the eyes of citizens in every urban center; super highways are proving to be more boa constrictors than rivers of steel; parking lots overpowering the enterprises resorts they service. Vernon G. kenzie, chief of the Air Pollutio vision of the Public Health Ser warns that the carbon dioxide being poured into the atmosp may turn the earth into an ove trapping the sun's heat. Smog Today & Smog Tomorrow

During the last week of October, as the first automobiles to be equipped with systems for reducing the air pollution of their exhaust began to appear on the streets and freeways of Los Angeles, the worst smog of a decade spread over the entire Los Angeles Basin. Eye smarting, headaches and nausea were experienced in sections previously immune to these effects. "First-stage alerts," based on oxidant (principally ozone) measurements exceeding one-half part per million, were declared. The Los Angeles County air pollution control officer, Louis J. Fuller, urged motorists to refrain from unnecessary driving, and prepared to take steps to close down industrial operations and restrict traffic if the second-stage alert, triggered when the oxidant level rises to one part per million, were reached.

The people of the area, lulled for the past few years by assurances that the problem was being met by the control of stationary sources and the installation of crank-case blow-by recirculating devices on cars, and that the remaining major source—auto exhaust—would soon be controlled also, became aroused once more by the intensity, extent and duration of the siege. They demanded to know why, after twenty years of study, legislation and enforcement, the yellow-brown pall was as thick as ever and even more widespread. The answer of officials—that without the controls presently in force the smog would have been much worse — provided small solace. The "buck passing" of some politicians, such as the charge by Mayor Samuel W. Yorty that state officials, particularly Governor Edmund G. "Pat" Brown, have been negligent in developing controls, was recognized as political hay making. But the questions, why the smog is still with us, and what can and will be done, once more preoccupy a weeping, coughing public.

Despite frequent references to its lethal effect, no deaths have been traced directly to the smog of Los Angeles. However, it was surely a contributing factor in some marginal cases, and the general discomfort it produces has in the past given rise to such public reactions as the unseating of a chief of the County Air Pollution Control District and a mayor of Pasadena. Whether it will again have political repercussions depends in part on how realistically the people appraise the nature of the problem and the responsibility for its solution.

It has taken a long time to convince the people that the main offender is not industry — not the petroleum refineries, the steel and chemical processing companies — but rather the motor vehicles, now more than 4 million, driven daily by the citizens of the Los Angeles metropolitan area. Strict controls have been put on the industrial sources. But while motor vehicles had been first pointed to as a probable source in 1947, while the hydrocarbons and nitrogen oxides which are in their exhausts had been identified as the chemical raw materials of smog in 1950, and while by 1955 the major contribution of automobiles had been established, it is in the 1966 models to be sol California that the auto ind has introduced systems aimed a ducing the hydrocarbons. Contr the oxides of nitrogen is not ye ing attempted.

Los Angeles is almost uniqu the frequency and intensity of peculiar type of smog. To be other communities have ex enced attacks with increasing quency as the density of autom traffic has increased, but Los geles, which prided itself on it mate, must dolefully admit that climate, together with other graphical aspects, has mainta its eminence for this new kin misery, so different from the blanket with which coal-bur areas are all too familiar.

The London pea-souper is smog, a combination of coal s and fog. It occurs characteristi in the anticyclonic weather o cold winter season. In Los Ang however, no coal is burned a and smog occurs with low rel humidity, after any fog has "bu off." It appears in summer o warm days in other seasons.

In addition to large numbe automobiles, there must be c or light winds, a temperature i sion, and ample sunlight to co the hydrocarbons to irritating stances by photochemical proce Southern California has all ingredients in good measure: light winds, the strong and pe ent temperature inversion and quantities of intense sunshin addition to heavy traffic const moving (or occasionally sta throughout its network of free and surface streets.

t was the sensitive nose of Prof.
J. Haagen-Smid, a biochemist at California Institute of Techlogy, that identified the real nae of the smog. Professor Haagen-id, who had specialized in the ture of the chemical substances ponsible for odors, fragrances and flavors, realized that the characteristic odor—almost a stench—which accompanies Los Angeles smog resembled closely the odor produced when certain hydrocarbons combine with ozone. By putting such hydrocarbons together with ozone in a laboratory flask Haagen-Smid produced not only the characteristic odor, but also the eye irritation when persons were exposed to the reacted gases. Plants exposed to them showed the same type of damage to the leaves as is caused by smog.

Drawings by Tomi Ungerer

The existence of ozone in smoggy air had already been demonstrated in studies seeking to explain the cracking of tires and other rubber products. The mystery of where it came from was solved when further laboratory work showed that irradiation of a mixture of hydrocarbons and nitrogen dioxide in sunlight produced ozone as well as the other smog effects. Ozone concentration is now used as the primary index of smog intensity.

At first the oil industry disputed the role of hydrocarbons in producing smog effects and resisted attempts to control their emission during oil production and refining. It employed the Stanford Research Institute to carry on investigations paralleling those of the Air Pollution Control District, for which Professor Haagen-Smid worked as a consultant. Beginning in 1954, the oil interests participated in the formation of the independent Air Pollution Foundation, in which representatives of citizens groups, industrialists, commercial enterprises and the universities of the area joined in the attempt to foster an unbiased scientific solution to the problem.

While the initial investigations of the Stanford Research Institute suggested that many factors contributed to the smog manifestations, the accumulated evidence gradually confirmed Haagen-Smid's theory. A large smog reaction chamber, 50 cubic meters in volume, with artificial light sources capable of producing radiation equivalent to noon summer sun in Los Angeles, was developed under the auspices of the Air Pollution Foundation. In this chamber air containing amounts of hydrocarbons and nitrogen dioxide typical of the Los Angeles atmosphere was irradiated, and was found to develop high-ozone concentrations. To test for eye irritation, air from the chamber was conducted to booths where it passed over the eyes of volunteers. These people were subjected to air from the chamber and to pure filtered air in such fashion that they did not know when one or the other was being used. Their report of whether or not they experienced eye irritation and how much was thus not affected by subjective reactions. Similar tests were conducted with plants to see what concentrations of which hydrocarbons produced damage. The conclusion was that irradiation of certain mixtures of hydrocarbons and nitrogen dioxide, in concentrations which occur on smoggy days in Los Angeles, definitely produce eye irritation and plant damage of the type experienced.

Even before the evidence was conclusive, the emissions from the petroleum industry began to be controlled, at first on a voluntary basis, and subsequently by rule of the Air Pollution Control Board. Refinery operations were converted to closed systems; storage tanks were covered, and leaky valves and pipes were constantly monitored and repaired. From a loss of more than 850 tons of hydrocarbons per day, estimated in 1952, the emissions were cut to less than 100 tons in 1956.

Soon after the importance of hydrocarbons had been recognized, the operation of automobiles was pointed to as being probably as important a source of trouble as the refineries. It is estimated that even when in perfect operating condition an automobile gives off unburned 7 per cent of the fuel it uses. The loss is smaller at constant cruising speed, but in the stop-and-go driving conditions of city traffic the figure is considered conservative. In 1952, on the basis of this estimate, the emission of hydrocarbons by automobiles was approximately equal to that from the petroleum industry. But by 1956, when emissions from industry had come under control, the number of autos and the miles they traveled had increased to the point that car emissions were estimated to be 1,350 tons per day.

To confirm that auto exhaust really causes smog the Air Pollution Foundation smog chamber was again used. An automobile was mounted on a dynamometer which enabled it to simulate conditions on the road while remaining stationary. It was "programed" to spend given fractions of the time accelerating, cruising, decelerating and idling. The exhaust was diluted, introduced into the smog chamber, irradiated, and carried to the booths where the eyes of the test subjects waited. The exhaust was found to contain adequate hydrocarbons and nitrogen dioxide for the formation of ozone, eye irritation and plant damage.

Many people were not convinced. They regarded the indictment of auto exhaust as a "cover up" to shield industry. There were mass meetings of outraged citizens. The mayor of the city of Pasadena, one of the localities most affected, withdrew from the election race in the face of the campaign of Warren Dorn, now a county supervisor, who promised that he would "take decisive action against the causes of smog." Gradually, however, most of the people have come around to acknowledging that the scientists and the political authorities were not protecting industry, that industry had already been compelled to "clean house" to an extent unequaled anywhere in the world, and that further progress depended not on eliminating a few large sources but on controlling millions of small ones.

The emphasis of the attack thereupon shifted to the development of devices to control car emissions. The County Air Pollution Control District attempted to persuade the automotive industry to develop and incorporate appropriate devices in their products. At the same time other manufacturers were encouraged to undertake research, the idea being that as soon as effective devices were approved new regulations could require them on all vehicles in Los Angeles County.

In 1960, the state of California established the Motor Vehicle Control Board to set standards, approve devices and enforce their installation and maintenance. The control of crank-case blow-by emissions, which were estimated to contribute between 15 and 25 per cent of the hydrocarbons in the air, presented no technical difficulty if the recirculating device was part of the original engine design, and the automobile industry incorporated such controls in 1961 models sold in California as well as in 1963 models sold throughout the United States. Crank-case blow-by devices for used cars, although available, raise some technical problems, and the requirement for their installation was postponed by the 1965 legislature.

The control of exhaust emissions, which are the preponderant pollutants entering the atmosphere, proved a more difficult problem. In an attempt to reconcile the desirable with the feasible, standards were set in 1961 which require approved devices to reduce hydrocarbon emissions by 80 per cent and carbon monoxide by 60 per cent. Auto manufacturers were urged to devise methods to achieve thes ductions. Other firms and ind uals were solicited to submit

has been approved so far. An npt to delete the requirement two approved devices, which ld have given some firm a vir- monopoly in the supply of de- ; for used cars (the business is nated at $400 million) was de- ed in the legislature in October, ie height of the smog attack. No factory second device is in t. Thus for the present the re- ion of vehicle effluents will de- l on the slow departure of old from the scene.

This replacement had not begun in October, 1965, when rse weather conditions gave to a smog siege as serious as previously experienced. Will be the last one, now that cars exhaust-control systems have me available? Since new cars e onto the street faster than old go to the junkyards, it is clear even if the control systems are ntained at the required levels of ctiveness throughout the lives he cars equipped with them, the ction of hydrocarbons will not 80 per cent at the end of ten s when most of the present cars e been replaced. In fact, at the ent rate of vehicle proliferation, reduction may be little more one half that figure, and in ther ten to twenty years Cali- ia may be back to full smog in.

A further concern is the fact that systems presently approved or in prospect do not control the amount of oxides of nitrogen in the exhaust. In addition to being a reagent in the photochemical reaction which produces eye irritation and other smog effects, nitrogen dioxide is poisonous in itself. Scientific opinion differs as to whether reduction of hydrocarbons alone will alleviate smog symptoms, but the consensus leans toward the view that nitrogen-oxide control is in any case essential.

A first step toward requiring this control was taken October 29, when the California State Board of Public Health adopted standards for purity of air with respect to oxides of nitrogen. It set the level at 0.25 parts per million, a value frequently exceeded in Los Angeles smog. The Automobile Manufacturers Association has opposed the setting of standards for nitrogen oxides. It remains to be seen whether the auto industry will make efforts to eliminate these emissions before being forced to do so by competitive devices. It will be years before this pollutant is controlled, for the standards of allowable concentrations in exhausts must first be established, and after that a means to accomplish them must be found.

The people of Los Angeles are becoming aware that the control of pollution from internal combustion engines will come slowly and with difficulty. They are now asking about alternative solutions, such as an adequate mass-transit system, perhaps subsidized by the gasoline tax. The possibility of returning to electric power both for mass transit and for individual vehicles is being called more and more to their attention. Whatever their other drawbacks, electric vehicles are smog-free.

The citizens of Los Angeles and California are somewhat discouraged that after twenty years of hard work the situation seems so far from solution. They are encouraged, however, by the fact that after having fought the battle against smog alone for many years, they are at last being joined by other cities and states, and by the federal government. The recognition that it is not a problem peculiar to the West Coast, and the joining of the forces on a national basis, may possibly compel the auto industry to assume its responsibility for the development of smog-free vehicles. Only when truly smog-free transportation is available can there be pure air in the modern megalopolis. The mustering of the power of the federal government through the Motor Vehicle Air Pollution Control Act may lead to a more alert response from the auto industry than Los Angeles and California were able to stimulate in the past.

These lots are a synthetic desert, er and uglier than the sandy shes and brown hills that Spanish explorers plodded across. They allow no rain to soak down and no seed or rootstalk to send green shoots up. Acres at a time, created in a day by a few men and machines, parking lots replace a famous scene. They replace an Eden of orange and apricot orchards, vineyards, olive groves, venerable specimen trees from five continents, and fields with soil uniquely fit for lima beans, celery, lettuce and flowers grown for blooms or seed. Homes go, too, whole blocks of them, and commercial structures, along with rounded hilltops, mountain meadows, ocean headlands and arroyos. Just about everything must give way to the car—immobile as well as on the move.

For every hour that the average owner drives his car, or idles it at a stop signal or in a traffic tie-up, he leaves it parked for eleven hours. Though autos in motion are a principal impression the air passenger receives of Los Angeles at night, parked cars are the principal scenery when one dines by the tower windows of Hosts International at the airport or sightsees from the top of City Hall, or when one arrives for the races at Santa Anita or Hollywood Turf Club or winds up to the stadium where the Dodgers are enshrined.

In 1964 the dealers of Los Angeles County sold more cars than dealers in any state, except for California itself and five other states. In that year, California officials registered 3,220,849 automobiles in Los Angeles County alone, and millions more in adjacent counties. Cars in such numbers, plus the ungainly rectangular inflexibility of each separate car, the inherent limit to open space even in this recently agricultural area, the habit of riding alone to work or to shop—these have made the stationing of cars a major economic and emotional problem. It is not much helped by the multistoried parking structures that begin to rise at supermarkets, department stores, office buildings, and at Los Angeles International Airport.

Parking is now a primary concern for government bureaus and for private employers, since most employees, like their bosses, drive to work, solitary amid their tons of metal and safety glass. Parking is expensive in downtown lots, where half-hour charges seem a racket to many autoists, and streetside parking meters, though democratic, are penny and nickel nuisances. Thriving gloriously in the suburbs, a new breed of merchandisers, including discount houses, provide 3 square feet of free parking for every square foot of building at ground level. In valleys and on hillsides away from central Los Angeles and San Diego, Santa Barbara and Anaheim, squat new department stores and shopping plazas are surrounded by plains of blacktop, to which drivers will come for miles in order to make all their purchases at one parking.

Doctors, dentists and beauty-shop operators find premises available to customer parking. With proprietors of theatres, amusement parks, hostelries, race tracks, arenas and cemeteries, parking facilities become an obsession. No parking, no patrons. So the fleets of dump trucks bring in the loads of blacktop and the rollers quickly flatten it for patrons at motels in San Diego's Mission Valley, or amid the sand dunes and the former date palm gardens near Palm Desert, for crowds at Disneyland or at Knott's post-agricultural Berry Farm. At pleasure spots in the San Bernardino and San Gabriel mountains, machine-age lumberjacks deforest long strips to make way for stationary vehicles of summertime lake swimmers and wintertime skiers. Planners in Long Beach say that surfside development is governed not by the number of people who can get on the sand but by the number of cars that can find parking space. Big public developments like Mission Bay in San Diego have elaborate ratios such as 1.25 parking spaces for each guest facility in a motel or boatel, .3 parking space for each 400 square feet of solid ground park area, or .3 parking space for each 2 linear feet of beach.

Churches, high schools, museums, women's clubs, golf clubs and colleges face the same problem. California State College at Los Angeles, reached almost exclusively by private car on its isolated, brand-new campus, provides only 3,100 car spaces for its 20,000 students, but soon a whole vale of modest homes will give way to a parking area. San Fernando State College has 2,500 more student drivers than parking places. As a result, 4 miles of near-by residential streets are a teeming parking district.

In 1962, the University of California at Los Angeles provided on its ex-hilltops more parking space, paid for by faculty, students and visitors, than is to be found at any other university in the world. Yet each day hundreds of students were turned away from the lots and the one multilevel parking structure, and many students parked a mile away and walked to their classes—a healthful but involuntary act. Some took to biking. Some who had been admitted to the university did not register because they were dissatisfied with the parking arrangements. Two years later — when

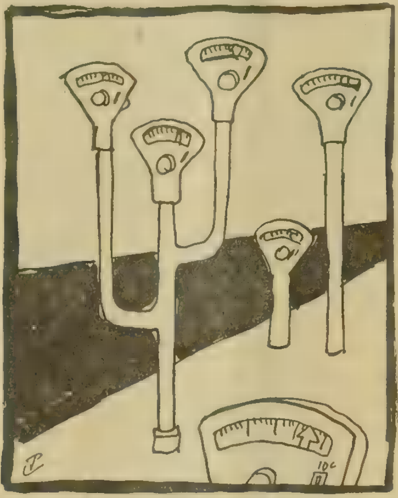
New buildings ie center of Los Angeles add a on square feet of office space ar, and car-parking needs go up t 10 per cent annually. The lt is a quickened destruction, e exact than wartime bombing, iseful and sometimes historic dings. The Civic Center area s more and more like Arizona's ument Valley, with monolithic rs scattered amid a vista of sterile pavement covered with lifeless bodies of automobiles, ing in the sunlight, radiating heat, giving to sun-baked mo- ts walking toward shade such machine-age sensations as hot s, sweaty torsos and squinting .

Each Southern California er who goes to the theatre or nvited out to dinner faces the problem of stationing his car within feasible distance of the address. All plans must allow plenty of time for the rituals of parking. The Los Angeles City School Districts in announcements of teachers' institute meetings has said: "To insure prompt arrival at the place of meeting it is recommended that an allowance of at least twenty minutes be made to overcome the parking problems which are encountered everywhere."



Many hosts couple their invitation with instructions as to where to park, especially in crowded apartment-house districts, on constricted beach-house peninsulas as at Newport, or near boulevards posted with "No Parking Anytime." Hillside hosts for wedding receptions and other special events sometimes have their guests park on a wide boulevard below and then transport them up and down by means of a shuttle bus or cab service. Couples on a tight budget take the cost of parking, like the cost of baby-sitting, into account when figuring the prospective expenses for an evening out at a theatre or restaurant. People have been known to let family ties and friendships fade and die because parking was too difficult near where the others lived.

In a world of self-transportation, one solution to parking is to make the vehicle part of the event. Hence the early success of drive-in eateries, the building of drive-in banks and liquor stores, the present incipient success of drive-in churches sanctified parking lots), and the widespread success the year around of drive-in movie theatres (attended by families by the carload).

The logic of this trend leads to the trailer park, where people inhabit their vehicles, existing organically connected to their tires, license plates and automobile-registration slips. There are more than 250,000 trailers in Los Angeles County, together with 200,000 in other Southern California counties; a high percentage of all these are dwellings. In California, as in Arizona and Florida, the trailer park is the ultimate in automobile society — it is round-the-clock living on the parking lot.

More and more, the Southern California that attracted the nation's mobile millions by its natural beauty, its exotic crops, and its tree-lined residential streets is being resurfaced with parking lots for the cars and trailers of the thousands who arrive each month to see the very things that their arrival and their motor vehicles are destroying. The process will end when Southern California is completely paved from the ocean to the Colorado River.

he New Russian Revolution . . . Margaret Miller

October 4, 1965, Russia's Coun- of Ministers approved the new rter for Industrialists which been promised by Premier ushchev as long ago as Novem- 1962. This was the final step he sweeping economic reforms ated by Mr. Khrushchev and tinued by his successors. The lights of the new law give practical details of the way it affects plant management.

The manager must still operate within the general limits of the state plan, as decided by the government and conveyed to him in the form of "control figures" by the body to which his enterprise is directly subordinated. But within this framework he is free to work out his own plan according to the capacity and resources of his plant. It is the duty of the supervisory body to insure that the plan finally given to the enterprise provides the director with the labor, finance and materials he needs to carry out the duties assigned to him, and also that these duties are mutually coordinated. Once the plan is set, the higher body is specifically debarred from making any changes during the course of the planned period, unless the enterprise is first consulted, and corresponding changes are made in the amount to be produced, planning indicators and budget allocations. A factory which has successfully fulfilled its plan and has materials and by-products left over is given a new freedom to use these for further production, at its own discretion. The aim of this section is to give the director fewer and more general planning directives, and to let him work out the executive details himself.

The new charter shows definite indications of a desire to strengthen local initiative in these matters. The plant director confirms the contracts entered into with building organizations in the case of capital construction and repairs, and with research institutes when improvements in technology are concerned. Part of the central funds allotted for these purposes can, at the discretion of the director, be used for construction that benefits his staff: housing, children's nurseries, medical buildings, etc.

The provisions here also strengthen local initiative by leaving at the disposal of the enterprise a much larger proportion of the profits accruing from its work, and from allowances for depreciation, instead of directing the bulk of these to central funds as hitherto. The director thus gains considerable scope for ploughing money back into his own concern. For example, the production fund could be used to finance technical improvements, modernize equipment, expand production, in ways he decides woul

One's first reaction to this g-awaited piece of legislation is astonishment that three years of nsive work behind the scenes, ompanied by an avalanche of eches by Soviet leaders, pro- als and counter-proposals by nomists, industrialists, govern- nt officials, should have done more than confer upon Soviet nagers executive powers that taken for granted by their coun- parts in free-enterprise societies. In fact, any Western director who failed to exercise them would be held to be in grave dereliction of duty. Against the background of Soviet conditions, however, the changes are tremendous, indeed revolutionary.

The key to their significance lies in the frequency with which the charter intervenes between the supervisory and the subordinate body, with the aim of giving the latter genuine freedom of action. The highly centralized, detailed control from above, characteristic of industrial management in the days of Stalin's "command" economy, has definitely been put aside. Mr. Kosygin's deputy, K. T. Mazurov, spoke of the former passivity, irresponsibility, even negligence, of some factory managers. Under the new dispensation they are expected to display "boldness" and "independence" in decision making. He did not mention that they had exercised these qualities unofficially in the past; but if they had not done so, the "command" system would have broken down much sooner than it did. Faced with unrealistic and frequently inconsistent orders from above, Russia's practical men had for many years banded together in an "economic resistance movement." They evaded the worst unreason of planning techniques by hoarding labor and materials, employing their own agents to secure needed supplies on the ubiquitous free market, setting up an extensive system of personal extra-plan contacts. An easily recognizable object of the charter is to make such activities unnecessary.

The charter also reveals the disappearance of the doctrinaire insistence on the inherent superiority of Socialist planning over the market mechanism, on the Marxist belief that, labor being the sole source of value, there could be no need for the automatic economic til now, man's freedom to act has n limited by two factors: the use force on the part of the rulers sentially their capacity to kill dissenters); and, more impor- t, the threat of starvation against who were unwilling to accept imposed conditions of work. Whoever rebelled against these nditions, even if no other force s used against him, was con- nted with hunger. The principle vailing throughout most of hu- n history (in capitalism as well in the Soviet Union) is: "He who s not work shall not eat." This eat forced man not only to act accordance with what was de- nded of him, but also to think d to feel in such a way that he uld not even be tempted to act ferently.

The reason that past history is based on the threat of starvation has its source in the fact that, with the exception of certain primitive societies, man has lived at a level of scarcity. There were never sufficient material goods to satisfy the needs of all; usually a small group of "directors" took for themselves all that their hearts desired, and the many who could not sit at the table were told it was God's or Nature's law that this should be so. But it must be noted that the main factor in this was not the greed of the "directors" but the low level of material productivity.

A guaranteed income, which becomes possible in the era of economic abundance, could for the first time free man from the threat of starvation, and thus make him truly free and independent economically and psychologically. Nobody would have to accept conditions of work merely because he feared hunger; a talented or ambitious man or woman could learn new skills in preparation for a different kind of occupation. A woman could leave her husband, an adolescent his family. People would no longer learn to be afraid, if they did not have to fear for their bread. (This holds true, of course, only if no political threat inhibits man's free thought, speech and action.)

A guaranteed income would not only establish freedom as a reality rather than a slogan; it would also establish a principle deeply rooted in Western religious and humanist traditions: man has the right to live, regardless! This right to live—to have food, shelter, medical care, education, etc.—is an intrinsic human right that cannot be restricted by any condition, not even the one that the individual must be socially "useful."

The shift from a psychology of scarcity to that of abundance is one of the most important steps in human development. A psychology of scarcity produces anxiety, envy, egotism (to be seen most drastically in peasant cultures the world over). A psychology of abundance produces initiative, faith in life, solidarity. The fact is that most men are still geared psychologically to the economic facts of scarcity, when the industrial world is in the process of entering a new era of economic abundance. Because of this psychological "lag," many people cannot even understand the new ideas implicit in the concept of a guaranteed income.

A further effect of a guaranteed income, coupled with greatly diminished working hours for all, would be to make the spiritual and religious problems of human existence real and imperative. Until now, most men have been too much occupied with work (or too tired after work) to be seriously concerned with such problems as "What is the meaning of life?" "What do I believe in?" "What are my values?" "Who am I?" If work ceases to be the main concern, man will either be free to confront these problems seriously—or he will be driven half mad by boredom. It should follow that economic abundance, liberation from fear of starvation, would mark the transition from a pre-human to a truly human society.

To balance this picture, one must raise some objections against, or at least questions about, the concept of a guaranteed income. The most obvious question is whether it would not reduce the incentive for work.

It is a fact that even now there is no work for an ever-increasing sector of the population, and that for these people the question of incentive is irrelevant. Nevertheless, the objection is a serious one. I believe, however, that it can be demonstrated that material necessity is by no means the only incentive for work and effort. Pride, social recognition, pleasure in work itself—examples of the force of such alternate incentives are not lacking. An obvious one is the work of scientists, artists, et al., whose achievements were not principally motivated by the need for money but by a mixture of factors: interest in the work, satisfaction in the achievement, or the wish for fame. But obvious though this example may be, it is not entirely convincing, because it can be said that such outstanding people will make extraordinary efforts precisely because they are extraordinarily gifted; hence they give no clue to the reactions of the citizenry at large. This objection may be overcome, however, if we consider the incentives for people who are not notably creative. What prodigious effort is expended on sports, on recreation, on hobbies, from which no material rewards are to be expected! The extent to which interest in the work process itself can be an incentive for working was closely demonstrated for the first time by Prof. Elton Mayo in his classic study at the Chicago Hawthorne works of the Western Electric Company. The very fact that unskilled women workers were drawn into the experiment of work productivity of which they were the subjects, the fact that they became interested and active participants in the experiment, resulted in increased productivity. As a corollary, their physical health improved.

The situation becomes even clearer from the study of older forms of society. The efficiency and incorruptibility of the traditional Prussian civil service were famous, despite the fact that wages were very low. In this case such concepts as honor, loyalty, duty were the determining motivations for excellent work. Still another motivation appears in pre-industrial societies (like medieval Europe or the half-feudal Latin-American states at the beginning of this century). In these societies the carpenter, for instance, wanted to earn enough to satisfy the needs of his traditional standard of living, and would refuse more work when he had reached that point.

Aside from the multiple nature of the incentives to work it is a fact that man, by nature, is not lazy. On the contrary, he suffers from the results of inactivity. People might enjoy loafing for one or two months, but the vast majority (except for the very sick or the most philosophic) would after that beg to work, even without pay. The fields of child development and mental illness offer abundant data in this connection; what is needed is a systematic investigation in which the available facts are organized and analyzed from the standpoint of "laziness as disease." Modern, alienated man is deeply bored (usually unconsciously) and hence has a yearning for laziness, rather than for activity. This yearning, however, is itself a symptom of our "pathology of normalcy." Presumably, misuse of the guaranteed income would disappear

filch caramels after a few w

Skepticism as to the b fits of the guaranteed incom

In order to deal responsibly this objection we must consider spirit of contemporary industrial ciety. Man has transformed him into a homo consumens. He is racious and passive, and tries by continuous and ever-increas consumption (there are many ical examples for this mechan in cases of overeating, overbuy overdrinking, as a reaction to is anxious, lonely, depressed

sons, i.e., the need for mass

Contemporary man, thus, has unlimited hunger for more more consumption. From this true "abundance" (psychologic

those reasons I believe that

What, then, must be done to lement the guaranteed income?
erally speaking, we must change system from one of maximal to of optimal consumption. This try from the production of comlities for individual consumption the production of commodities od is defined here as enhancing nan aliveness, awakeness, protivity, sensitivity; bad as weak-ng or paralyzing these human entials.) In the case of drug adtion, overeating, alcoholism, we make such a distinction. Study in this area should lead to the following practical consideration: what are the minimum legitimate needs of an individual? (For instance: one room per person, so much clothing, so many calories, so many culturally valuable commodities such as radio, books, etc.) In a society as abundant as the United States today, it should be easy to figure the cost for a decent subsistence minimum and also what the limits for maximal consumption might be. Progressive taxation on consumption beyond a certain threshold could be considered. All this would mean the combination of the principles of a guaranteed income, with transformation of our society from maximal to optimal individual consumption, and a drastic shift from production for individual needs to production for public needs.

I believe it is important to consider along with the idea of a guaranteed income the concept of free consumption of certain commodities. One example would be that of bread, then milk and vegetables. Let us assume that everyone could go into any bakery and take as much bread as he liked (the state would pay the bakery for all bread produced). The greedy would at first take more than they could use, but after a short time this "greed consumption" would wear itself out and people would take only what they really needed. Such free consumption would, in my opinion, create a new dimension in human life (unless we look at it as the repetition on a much higher level of the consumption pattern in certain primitive societies). Man would feel freed from the principle, "he who does not work shall not eat." Even this beginning of free consumption might constitute a novel experience of freedom. It is obvious even to the non-economist that the provision of free bread for all could be easily paid for by the state, which would cover this disbursement by a corresponding tax. However, we can go a step further. Assume that not only all minimal needs for food were obtained free—bread, milk, vegetables, fruit—but that everybody could obtain, without paying, say one suit, three shirts, six pairs of socks, etc., per year; that transportation was free (requiring, of course, vastly improved systems of public transportation), while private cars became much more expensive. Eventually, one imagines, housing could be solved in the same way, by big housing projects with sleeping halls for the young, one small room for older, or married couples, to be used without cost by anybody who chose.

This leads me to the suggestion that a way of solving the guaranteed-income problem would be by free minimal consumption of all necessities, instead of through cash payments. The production of these minimum necessities, together with highly improved public services, would keep production going, just as would guaranteed-income payments.

It may be objected that this method is more radical, and hence less acceptable than the proposal to guarantee everyone an income for life; but it must be noted that free minimal services could theoretically be installed within the present system, while the idea of guaranteed income will not be acceptable to many not because it is not feasible but because of the psychological resistance against the abolishment of the principle: "he who does not work shall not eat."

One other philosophical, political and psychological problem to be studied is that of freedom. The Western concept of freedom was to a large extent based on the freedom to own property, and to exploit it, as long as other legitimate interests were not threatened. This principle has actually been punctured in many ways in Western industrial societies by taxation, which is a form of expropriation, and by state intervention in agriculture, trade and industry. At the same time, private property in the means of production is becoming increasingly replaced by the semi-public property typical of giant corporations. While the guaranteed-income concept would mean some additional state regulations, it must be remembered that today the concept of freedom for the average individual lies not so much in his freedom to own and exploit property (capital) as in his freedom to consume whatever he likes. Many people today consider it an interference with their freedom if unlimited consumption is restricted, although only those on top are really free to choose what they want. The competition between different brands of the same commodities and different kinds of commodities creates the illusion of personal freedom, when in reality the individual wants what he is conditioned to want. A new approach to the problem of freedom is necessary; only with the transformation of homo consumens into a productive, active person will man experience freedom as the opportunity to do what is most fulfilling and not as an unlimited choice of commodities.

The full effect of the principle of the guaranteed income is to be expected only in conjunction with:

(1) A change in habits of consumption, the transformation of homo consumens into the productive, active man (in Spinoza's sense).

(2) The creation of a new sp
tual attitude, that of humanism theistic or nontheistic forms).

(3) A renaissance of truly de cratic methods (for instance, a r lower house of Congress in wh would be integrated decisions
rived at by hundreds of thousa of face-to-face groups).

The danger that a state t nourishes all could become a mot goddess with dictatorial quali can be overcome only by a sim taneous, drastic increase of de cratic procedure in all spheres social activities. The fact is t even today the state is extrem powerful, without giving these be fits.

In sum, together with econo

teed income, other study m

Discipline in the Dark

Richard M. Gummere, J

America has generally outlawed the manhandling of prisoners, soldiers, sailors, vagrants, lunatics and animals. But not school children. On the contrary, more of them are being beaten today, in more schools, than were thwacked a generation ago. That is the guess, anyway, of knowledgeable observers of education—and the great trouble is that informed guessing is at present as near as we can come to an overall view of the practice.

The American pupil is punished in the dark. Educators pummel him in private (or before school staff witnesses) not for his protection but for their own. They then tuck their paddles or rulers in their desk drawers. I know one principal who not only calls culprits into his office for punishment—he takes them into his closet. And in some school systems beating is supposed to be done after school hours.

Perhaps educators cloak their punishments in mystery because of fastidiousness—a trait the profession acquired a century ago when the schoolmarm drove the uncouth old schoolmaster out of our classrooms. Perhaps they doubt the worth of discipline by force, perhaps they are ashamed, perhaps afraid. Whatever the cause, I lieve that this fog of reserve whi hides the beating of our school cl dren should be dispelled.

In English schools today—stil man's world—the view is less scure, and honest attempts at covering facts about corporal pu ishment are being made there. Su an investigation was feasible cause for centuries the English ha been thrashing their youngst heartily and openly (though for real thing, say the English, go Scotland!). Furthermore, the tional government requires all he masters to keep a record of all ph ical punishments inflicted.

Beating was once supposed lp make aristocratic young Eng- ishmen into Latin scholars or em- re builders and the rest into an edient proletariat. The symbol of thority in many English schools, blicly handed by a retiring head- aster to his successor, used to be whip. Today, the implement—sually a cane—appears to be ielded not to make pupils study or to mold their character, but mply to help subdue the most othersome of them.

The English are hassling more ociferously than we do over the erits of corporal punishment; the ebate flourishes not only among ducators but in the columns of e Times and on the floor of the ouse of Commons. There, one La- our M.P. pointed to a row of old tonians and Harrovians on the Op- osition bench and sarcastically sked: "Are we to take these hon- rable gentlemen as examples of e value of beating the young?" Cheers from the Labour benches.) n the other hand, the discipli- arians even sent Viscount Mont- omery of El Alamein—England's wn Admiral Rickover—to preach ough discipline in America. Among the English, too, well- nown laymen, speaking out on is- ues that baffle the experts, appear be received as soothsayers.) In wo addresses at Columbia Teach- rs College in 1954, the General as- ured our educators that if they beat nore children, fewer would turn nto "hoodlums and criminals."

Thus, many Englishmen read vith dismay the report of a study f discipline in thirty schools, Caning, Behavior, and Delinquency n Secondary Schools, West Ryding County Council, Yorkshire, 1961. The more whipping in a school, said he report, the worse its pupils' be- avior as rated by government in- spectors, and the higher the crime ate among them as judged by court ecords. Most important was this inding: if Harold and Henry grew up in the same type of neighbor- ood and home but now attend dif- ferent schools, and if Harold's school eats and Henry's does not, Harold is likely to have the worse record of behavior.

Profiting from the British example, we might lift the veil of decorum that has fallen over corporal punishment on this side of the ocean, and try to assess it for ourselves. Why are we so Pollyannaish about it? The issue is rife enough. The National Education Association estimates that three-quarters of our school systems allow principals or teachers to beat their students. And in the last few years there have been signs of increasing interest in it, popular as well as professional. Authorities as diverse as the following have been publicly calling for beating in school: the American Federation of Teachers (AFL-CIO), the editor of the Herkimer, N.Y., Evening Standard, the superintendent of schools of Washington, D.C. (over J. F. Kennedy's public objections), the New York State Legislature (thwarted by three gubernatorial vetoes in a row), a judge writing in The Saturday Evening Post, a University of Southern California educator in his published doctoral thesis, the school board of Berkeley, Calif. (probably shaken by last year's rebellion at the nearby university) and a New York City bureaucrat, who declared: "We will have to let the teachers hit the kids; it's the only way." Educators in Stamford, Conn., found themselves in an interesting predicament: ordered by officialdom to resume beating some of their worse malefactors, they could find no specifications for an instrument with which to do it and no one who remembered what had been used of old.

So if they feel they must hit the kids—of Stamford, New York City, Berkeley, Washington, Herkimer, or any other town—let them be not so sanctimonious and not so devious about it. One gathers that over here, as in England, the purpose may no longer be academic, nor moral, but social—to control a rambunctious minority. Assuming that it is so, the nation should know more about this minority—just what sort of child is beaten, how often, and by whom? With that data, we could then attack the key question: to what effect?

Such empirical knowledge is badly needed, especially because the theoreticians are of little help. They are confined to what psychologist Percival Symonds called "systematic wondering." Old dogmas that once flourished have been scrapped. When Benvenuto Cellini's father wanted him for sure to remember seeing a salamander run through the fire unharmed, he gave the boy a brisk whipping. When 17th-century Puritans wanted their children for sure to pass safely to the next world, they beat them furiously in this one.

Today's educators have no substitutes for the strong assumptions behind those disciplinary practices of the past. Even behavioral scientists have to beg off when asked about the nature of learning and discipline in humans. This is not surprising, since they have concentrated their research on animals, mainly rats, cats, monkeys, and those famous salivating dogs of Professor Pavlov. Out of studies of an army of such simple subjects, and of a corporal's guard of human beings, come what are called "clues."

Some scholars guess that corporal punishment does more harm than good because of "noise"—that term of the communications experts for messages that come through other than the one intended. The principal beats Jimmy to stop him from pitching pennies at recess. Jimmy stops. Fine. That message got through. But Jimmy may have picked up other messages: for instance, that the way to solve problems is by force.

Some guess that moderate anxiety stimulates certain youngsters to learn and behave better. But can "dermal pain" (the phrase of G. Stanley Hall, our great pioneer Edwardian psychologist) induce this moderate anxiety? Hall guessed it can. But which of the youngsters would be stimulated by it and which only rattled? No one knows.

Some guess that beating of school children serves as a relief for rigid or brittle teacher personalities; or as an outlet for the repressed hostility of professionals downgraded by society, and for the repressed sexuality of modern pedagogical puritans.

Some guess that the value of the whip or its variants is now symbolic, like that bundle of rods enclosing an ax that was carried in the train of a Roman official to remind the citizens of the state's authority to flog or behead them. The 18-inch ruler may be brandished by the principal, not so much to make young Jimmy shape up, as to symbolize the ultimate priority which that school gives to muscle over imagination.

One scholar of comparative education, Dr. Max Eckstein, asks this intriguing question: could we in America today be toughening up school discipline to prepare young people for the work of imposing our currently more imperial foreign policy? Rudyard Kipling showed in Stalky & Co. how he thought the discipline administered in English upper-class schools prepared the boys to help Britannia rule the waves and the Fuzzi-Wuzzies. England's role as a world power is waning, while America's is waxing. And in England today there is a growing mood to reduce corporal punishment of school children, in America a growing mood to increase it.

Some experienced educators have expressed another hypothesis: that the recent appeal for stepped-up corporal punishment in our schools may be mainly a social symptom: a protest by "upward-mobile" middle-class parents, administrators and teachers, aimed at lower-class children whom they resent or even fear. Not the Old Adam, but the Unsocialized Rebel has become the adversary. If so, it is no wonder that educators hesitate to let the outside world see how often they punish children who are not bad but unfortunate.

But as our critics guess, our educators beat. As a first step toward gathering statistics, why not unlimber a simple but effective weapon with which our ancestors fought the savage martinets a century ago: a public record of the number of youngsters beaten, school by school.

Our forefathers had no trouble keeping such records. For though their educators flailed away like medieval flagellants, they did it publicly. The all-time champion, both for mayhem and for thorough record keeping, may have been the German pedagogue described by Henry Barnard who noted every punishment he inflicted during fifty years in the classroom. In the end, his total exceeded 2 million, including 800,000 youngsters caned for mispronouncing Latin vowels.

Over here, Nathaniel Eaton, first head of Harvard, used a walnut cudgel to thrash his collegians so violently that even the 17th-century Massachusetts legislature intervened. Eaton was no sadistic eccentric either: his successor, President Henry Dunster, one of the finest educators in our history, enlivened the first commencement in the land by bringing two Harvard freshmen out in front of fellow students, faculty, parents, overseers and honored guests, and flogging them. In schoolhouses the hickory stick, birch rod, leather bridle, whalebone, or eel skin lay on the teacher's desk for all to see. A ca o'-nine-tails hung in some clas rooms. So did a leather paddle pe forated with holes just the righ size to raise blisters. These instruments could be set aside for othe less violent but just as public: th one-legged stool (try sitting on on for a few minutes), or the woode gag, like a horse's bit, to go in th mouths of the incorrigible talke (who are still with us).

The punishment was always visible; indeed, it was theatrical fo as in the spectacle of a hanging, it chief value was thought to lie in it edifying effect upon onlookers. Ol pictures of American schools sho a sort of umbrella stand, up fro containing the teacher's armory c canes. Sometimes he set up a whipping post in the classroom. He ceremoniously thumped transgresso on the head with his Bible, in whic it is written that we should bea our children "betimes." A teache could assert his authority on opening day by whipping everybody. H could even thrash the girls, thoug he might punish them still mor drastically: he might order one o them, burying her crimson face i her apron, to sit among the boys!

The bravura and visibility o his punishments were the old teacher's forte, but also his undoing. First when disgraced before one another' eyes, his pupils began to strike back Richard Henry Dana, whose Tw Years Before the Mast helped outlaw the flogging of sailors, remembered that one teacher ceased vicious beating only because his victim's classmates were about t come to the rescue. And sometime the older boys would rush their instructor and throw him head ove heels out the door, or even the window—for good. They did this s often that the custom got a name "Turning the Teacher Out."

Next, open savagery provoke some of the more sensitive educators to join in the revolt. A Ne York City principal, Dr. Thoma Hunter, whipped two boys for a offense of which he soon foun them innocent. Handing them hi whip, he ordered the boys to bea him with equal vigor. They refused He says he never struck anothe pupil. Neither did the graduates o the city's first teachers' college founded by Hunter and now name for him.

Finally, angry parents and school board members began to gather th tematic evidence needed for a owdown. Their stratagem was to uire principals to count the beat- gs given and to publish the count. the 1840s, Horace Mann, visit- a Massachusetts school of 250 pils, could find out that during recent week 328 floggings had n administered. With character- ic thoroughness, Mr. Mann calcu- ed that this made it 65⅔ per m.

Keeping count, our Victorian fore- ars could then make some ra- nal judgments. In New York City 1866, the number of beatings re- rted reached 130,000. Popular otest forced certain schools to p. Investigators compared attend- ce figures, examination scores, d pupil dismissals: the unbeaten ildren had improved remarkably er the beaten. That did it. The y soon outlawed corporal punish- nt in school.

Gathering such evidence, other ies and communities joined New rk. By the end of the century, ating of American school children d become much less frequent and rce. In the 1920s and 1930s, the actice appears to have reached a w ebb.

Public attention helped our cestors subdue corporal punish- ent. Public attention could help wipe it out today.

First, we must blow away the ofessional smoke screen. It's a od time to try, for practices and gulations vary wildly. At one ex- eme stand some school systems California, where even the high hool students are beaten, or some northern New England where e women teachers are said to use eir fists. In a school near my me (eastern rural New York ate) the guidance counselor told e he regularly knocks youngsters the floor of his office "to improve e school's morale." Though he used a small stir doing this to a ippled girl, the authorities have st appointed him principal. By a urky logic, the physical educators e called on to inflict corporal pun- hment in schools such as one my ildren attended where two pad- les hang in the gym—blue for ys, pink for girls.

In a further vast and important vilight area of discipline, irascible achers cuff, rap and shake pupils r throw chalk, erasers and other ppropriate missiles at them. One teacher of a friend of mine used to fire a tennis ball, made deadly by soaking in a glass of water on his desk. Such disciplinary virtuosos may still flourish here and there.

The hodgepodge of official regulations also signify a need and provide an opportunity for change. Spectacularly distinct in the confusion is New Jersey, the only state to have entirely forbidden corporal punishment in school (since 1867). A few other states impose regulations of sorts, according to a recent survey by an educator, Dr. Franklin Keith James: Maryland bans blows at a child's head; Oregon, Montana and Alaska, blows struck in anger (three warnings are required in Alaska). Georgia bans striking a child who is blind or deaf; Alaska confines blows to the child's posterior. Hawaii forbids cutting a pupil's hair.

But in numerous California school districts—on the firing line, as it were—Dr. James's survey revealed a kaleidoscopic variety of regulations, guesses about what goes on, and implied philosophies of discipline among both educators and laymen. Around the nation, he found, six of the largest cities permit corporal punishment; five ban it. According to my own observation, New York City does both. For the Board of Education officially forbids force, unofficially condones it, and lets administrators take the consequences. Frustrated by this paradox, and exposed in court, one New York principal jumped to his death from the roof of his school.

Characteristically, Dr. James refrained in his survey from asking educators how many of their pupils they beat. His reason: they wouldn't or couldn't tell.

Let's make the most of this "benign chaos," the phrase whereby Dr. Conant characterizes the state of all United States education. The American people should now insist on another systematic investigation: reverse the trend toward secrecy in physical discipline, keep an official tally of the number of punishments inflicted, record the names of teachers and administrators involved. Let the record be confidential—especially regarding the identity of the individual children beaten —but exact and complete. And let this data be kept in the principal's or superintendent's office, like the tally in pupils' attendance or IQs. That is, let us restore in a sophisticated form our Victorian principals' "Punishment Book," to be inspected by responsible persons justly concerned about the school's educational quality: the school board, state or regional accrediting officials, scholars doing educational research, parents with a reasonable concern.

Who is beaten, how often, by whom? Are the blows aimed at children from the other side of the tracks? at the spoiled rich? ethnic minorities? low IQs? high? Is one offender usually beaten often, or many once? Are teachers and principals who beat their pupils (or have them beaten) the new ones, or the old? the more competent or the less? men or women? academicians or educationists? proletarians or bourgeoisie?

With clear answers to such relatively simple questions, answers may then be attempted to the more complex ones: is disorder caused more by what we teach pupils, the way we teach it to them, the pupils we teach it to, or the society which requires them to learn it? Does the trouble come more from failure of our "saber-toothed" curriculum? our classroom Ichabod Cranes? our restless youth? or the distraught grownups?

Winston Churchill said you can tell a lot about a society from the way it treats its criminals. Surely also its children.

America, The Sublime

THE LIFE OF THE MIND IN AMERICA: From the Revolution to the Civil War. By Perry Miller. Harcourt, Brace & World. 338 pp. $7.50.

Alan Trachtenberg

When Perry Miller died suddenly in 1963 at the age of 58, he left unfinished what would have been the magnum opus of an already highly distinguished career: nothing less than a history of the development of the American mind in the first five decades of the 19th century. The work was to encompass nine books, each devoted to a facet of the "life of the mind" in this formative period. The plan was monumental, embracing such fields as evangelicism, jurisprudence, science, education, political economy, theology, philosophy, and themes like Nature and the Self. The entire work would have comprised something of a field theory of American mental life and, to judge by the completed volume (consisting of two books, "The Evangelical Basis" and "The Legal Mentality," and part of a third, "Tension: Technology and Science"), would have been a contribution of immense value.

But Miller's grand conception is not entirely lost. Although the current volume is a fragment, it contains enough for us to detect an emerging pattern, a network of themes which criss-cross the period. Most of the themes are already familiar: the 19th-century oppositions between heart and head, nature and law, practicality and theory. They are familiar in part because they are standard terms in the recovery of our literary tradition which began with Van Wyck Brooks, and others, about 1912. The study of American culture recently has been, in fact, mainly literary. Intellectual historians have joined literary scholars in acknowledging the major 19th-century writers as chief makers of a cultural tradition. This has led many people to assume that Emerson, Whitman and Melville were indeed decisive figures in their day. Nothing is further from the truth. Neither of these Olympians made much difference at all in the way most Americans conducted their intellectual and emotional lives. What they made of the themes and issues of their culture was something much different from what was transpiring in the minds of most of their countrymen.

Miller's book reminds us of this crucial fact about our civilization: the life of the mind was not, in the main, created by artists and "deep-diving" thinkers. Miller is not concerned with "great ideas" but with the prevailing frame of mind, the pattern of thought and predispositions to which most Americans (as far as the evidence shows) seemed to consent. His aim is to dramatize the inner workings of a new cultural mind trying to define itself. The subject, in short, is the process of thinking within the American consensus.

More clearly than anyone else so far, Miller demonstrates that consensus thinking in America has been in large part solipsistic. The world it conceives conforms to it, and it either absorbs all alien ideas to itself, or it rejects them as virtually nonexistent or, what amounts to the same thing, un-American. Miller's chief concern seems to be the mechanics of the consensus, how it works and what enforces it intellectually. The idea he has struck upon is that the enforcing agent is the concept of the sublime. Rhetoric of the sublime is more to the point for, although the prologue on "The Sublime in America" did not get written, it is clear nevertheless that the term refers to a feeling rather than a clear and distinct idea. Time after time writers and speakers on religion, law, science and technology, resort to the term as a final argument, an ultimate sanction. It had the effect of defending "Motherhood" or waving a flag: thought ceases and patriotic emotion takes over.

The sublime became a hallmark of the American consensus as a result of the repeated Revivals, or Awakenings, between 1800 and 1860. The concept was widely used in the 18th century, referring to the power inspiring awe. "Sublime objects a

The aim as to keep the country whole by eping it pure. What other grounds ere there but purity of heart for merica's divinely ordained mission? e missionary organizations themlves (an interesting instance of callated organization employed to prerve spontaneous feelings) had this ward compulsion: the need to save e heathen world (an act of disinrested benevolence) was really the ed to maintain permanent regenerion—and thus patriotism—at home. "We are a Christian people," somee declaimed in 1853, "and we are ee." No one argued with the parax. While the Revival was estabshing the voluntary principle of urch membership, it was also chartg the course toward a homogeneous hite Protestant society. The sublime d emerged as a kind of American ndamentalism, powerful enough to ke possession even of the traditional guers or advocates of freedom, the wyers. The most intriguing part of iller's story in this volume is the ama of the law accommodating itlf to the unshakable Christian-subme character of American culture. he realistic function of the law in is period, Miller never allows us forget, was to provide an instruentality for social and economic ange, to serve the interests of propty and empire. To do so, however, had to gain acceptance within merican life, which is to say, with the American mind, and thus ithin the "community of sublimity." his took an extraordinarily subtle eological maneuver, and an equally btle scholarly method on Miller's art. In his treatment of the conrgence of the multiple issues of onomics, politics and ideology in ecific court cases, like the Girard ill case, Miller works with true astery.

The basic intellectual drama as this: by their nature, law and lawrs were sophisticated, inscrutable, spect. Americans who imagined emselves as naturally reasonable nd benevolent were consequently ostile to what they took to be "a nspiracy of the learned." Distrust as the first barrier the law had to vercome if it was to win a place ithin American life. If its function as to establish the inviolability of property and to free the forces of change and progress, it had to assert "the universal against the particular, the comprehensive rationality of traditional wisdom against the fiat of individual statute." This in itself brought the law into conflict with the Revival's dream of creating "a distinct, unique millennial utopia." In its largest perspective the conflict was between cosmopolitanism and nationalism.

Considering the odds against it, the law's rise as the dominant profession in this period was, as Miller writes, an amazing feat. But, he demonstrates, it won its acceptance in terms that would have astounded the writers of the Constitution. Law became respectable, as it were, by availing itself of the "supreme sanction of the 'sublime.'" The essential character of American law was its negativism and its cosmopolitanism (its most strenuous act was gaining the acceptance of English Common Law). Rhetorically, however, it learned to use a language which made its goals sound identical to the Revival's. The sanctions it developed in the mind included the idea that law was the same as moral perception and thus a "vision of perfection to which this society might uniquely aspire." It garbed itself in "selfless, disinterested patriotism"; it appealed "to the peculiar purity of this society"; it was merely a translation "into technicalities of Almighty Wisdom." Once the Christian character of American law was secured, jurists could join the clergy in saluting the sublime, and law could set about to save the nation—and its imperial course.

What the law had done in actuality was to define its domain as primarily the property relations within society, and to free those relations from pietistic restrictions (this was the significance of the Girard Will case). But in order to do this it had to confirm publicly the existence of the "other world" as the domain of the clerical brethren. Thus it absolved itself of the suspicion of atheism, and by uttering the incantations of American sublimity, of the charge of cosmopolitanism. Underlying tensions were thereby swept out of sight, and the life of the mind seemed to run a course as smooth as ever.

The Civil War marked the collapse of this mighty effort to affirm unity and preserve rule of law. It was a sign of the American mind's inability to fulfill its own rhetorical directives. Inner contradictions had rendered the law helpless to prevent what it had fervently tried to prevent: an emotional onslaught, and violent warfare, against the sanctity of compact and orderly process. The law was betrayed, on one hand, by its commitment to the proposition that its purpose "was not to enforce freedom but to protect property from legislative, popular, or fanatical invasion." The Dred Scott decision represented the self-defeating extremes of negativism. It was also, in the eyes of some, "a vulgarization of discourse," a surrender to the blindness and vapidity of the rhetoric of the sublime.

What Miller makes unmistakably clear is that the mainstream of mental life in America, the currently vaunted consensus, can be a rather deadly influence. The truly colossal efforts to forge a cultural identity and to define the adjective "American"—a necessary task—very nearly defined away the possibility of culture itself as a vehicle of self-realization. The labors of figures like Emerson and Melville to create personal visions appear fully heroic in light of the limits placed upon thought i their culture. The kind of sheer e istential being which Whitman reco nized as the genuine historical o portunity of the New World—"One' Self I sing, a simple separate pe son, / Yet utter the word Democrati the word En-Masse" — has not y found a place within the consensu The contemporary relevance of Mi ler's research is obvious enough. Th question whether a black man ca be an American in all senses of th word is really one phase of a muc larger question; can a man, simpl as a man, be an American? It is tru that our society will grant dissente their legal rights, but does our cu tural mind have a place for the ind vidual, or the political party, whic stands outside of the consensus?

Miller's findings leave us with knowledge of how troubling the wor "American" can be. The problems identity which have plagued our cu ture are, in large part, the penalt of newness and experiment (can culture be declared into being? With our peculiar set of historic circumstances the problem was i escapable, and Miller is surely rig in characterizing the Civil War primarily a "majestic folk struggle an expression of accumulated te sions. Miller re-creates the life of th mind before the war as a drama life-and-death issues. Just off-stag is Lincoln, who will emerge as th frontiersman, the natural man, wh has disciplined the heart by goin to school to Blackstone. He will wag the war not as an evangelical cr sade, but a crusade for law, for th sacred obligations of contracts, property and of expanding nationa ism. But did the war—was it inten ed to—advance the cause of genui freedom? In its recovery from violen American society may have learne flexibility in advancing its econom and political aims, and adroitness i avoiding showdowns. But the lesso of the past two decades seems to b that the essential frame of refe ence persists: cautionary, nervou suspicious of cosmopolitanism, an given to the sanction of the sublim With the rhetoric of consensus dom nating political life, the chief si nificance of the new styles of prote among young people may lie in the challenge to this inherited view the world. Perry Miller's book help enormously in understanding that i heritance, and in this sense is major contribution to the life of th mind in our own day.

MINISTRATION OF A REVOLUTION: Executive Reform in Puerto Rico Under Governor Tugwell, 1941-1946. By Charles T. Goodsell. Harard University Press. 254 pp. $4.95.

Gordon K. Lewis

iis book is another exercise in the owing literature of American libal mythology with reference, this ne, to its colonial derivatives in the ribbean. Just as the Schlesinger lumes on the New Deal constructd the questionable thesis of a Reblican "old order" shattered by a oseveltian "new order," so the odsell volume builds up the image a bad colonial tradition in Puerto co ended by a Tugwellian New al, the administrative reforms of hich in the 1940s laid the foundans for the social "revolution" that s—according to the current Popu Democratic credo, which the auor implicitly embraces—provided e answer to colonialism and commusm in the Pan Caribbean basin. It a dull book, written dully; Profesr Goodsell does not suffer from enrged imagination. The inclusion of otographs in a purportedly schostic treatise invites the reader to nder to which particular audience e book is addressed; for if, as photoaphs suggest, it seeks out the mide-brow audience of magazine-readg America then one might suspect at the thing is done better by books e Ruth Gruber's Puerto Rico: Land Promise or Thomas Aitken's Poet the Fortress, both composed in the le of breathless enthusiasm appropiate to adoring liberal authors in e presence of Puerto Rican pitinqui achievement.

The book begs all the seminal estions. It naturally avoids the argance of Governor Tugwell's own tobiographical account of the ped. But it commits the same miske of assuming that a well-intenmed colonial chief executive could do the basic evils of colonialism, ll present in the contemporary erto Rican scene. It catalogues at was the record of the best, bend doubt, of Presidential appointents to the old Spanish Palace in n Juan. But it fails to apprehend the massive contradiction involved in seeking to impose an administrative democracy upon a colonial system. For, throughout, Governor Tugwell thought in terms of a beneficent American leadership. It was, true, enlightened. But it was still only enlightened colonialism. It sought less to abolish colonialism than merely to change the colonial climate. The Governor, in sum, was a liberal seeking to work an illiberal system. He does not seem to have realized, any more than his Puerto Rican successors, that—to paraphrase the remark of the Algerian delegate in the General Assembly 1952 debate on the Algerian War—it is not the status of Puerto Rico that is at stake but the status of the United States in Puerto Rico. Because Professor Goodsell does not fully admit this he manages to write a book on the Tugwellian administrative reforms, admittedly real and important, as if it were the story of instituting the city manager scheme in Cleveland or reforming the township system in Massachusetts.

Not only this. The book reiterates, albeit with some academic caution, the myth of Governor Tugwell, the skilled planner, building up his team of young Puerto Rican administrators against the pressures of the Puerto Rican politicians. Much of the history of American municipal reform has been, in fact, such a conflict between the administrative reformers and the machine "bosses." But the neat political-administrative dichotomy does not fit the Puerto Rican picture. For the public servant in the American-type democracy cannot escape the pressures, or resist being himself somehow shaped by them, of the brutalizing political arena, as the recently published Lilienthal diaries amply demonstrate; and in Puerto Rico the pressures were magnified tenfold by the colonial context. The Governor was an alien executive responsible only to the absentee Presidential will. He became, much more than his Boswells are willing to admit, a skilled manipulator in the political game. There was the minor scandal of his attempt to retain his essentially political post of university chancellor along with his new gubernatorial appointment, and his failure to comprehend that the local storm thereby set loose was something more than the injured dignidad of disappointed creole candidates for the university post; and even Professor Goodsell, in his inadequate description of the affair, permits himself a murmur of disapproval. Nor was the Governor always the magnanimous liberal of the myth built around him. His 1943 proposals for colonial reform included the establishment of a Presidentially appointed commissioner general who would presumably be able to curb the powers of a local governor who would then be popularly elected. Yet at the end of his tenure he could go no further than an endorsement of the new postwar British Colonial Office policies which, in the form of the Colonial Development and Welfare scheme, were simply an elaborate social welfarism, leaving untouched the basic economic structure of the colonial empire. In fact, this policy was severely criticized at that time in Professor Simey's Welfare and Planning in the West Indies (which, incidentally, Professor Goodsell seems not to have heard of, despite his book's claim to be a study in comparative public administration). The only extenuating excuse for the Governor, here, is that his position was no more radical than the ideology of postwar American liberalism in general, as evident in the books written at the time by Paul Blanshard and Annette Baker Fox. American liberals, any more than British Socialists, have not found it easy to divest themselves of a certain inverted cultural chauvinism when drawing up nostrums for the dependent colonial peoples.

The picture of the American planner locked in combat with the Puerto Rican political set is, in fact, fantastically awry. The Governor saw the whole scene in terms of yet another Rooseveltian drama in which he played the role of the President and Muñoz, as it were, that of Sam Rayburn, without ever fully appreciating that the genius of Muñoz made such an allocation of role playing utterly unrealistic. For if Tugwell was not just the high-minded administrator neither was Muñoz just the political leader lending his consent to the program. He was, much more, the insular patriot, the romantic poet-politician (so completely unknown in American politics), Burke's philosopher in action. The Governor failed to read him properly because Tugwellian Fabianism was, in its ideological roots, profoundly anti-political. It dreamed, as did the Webbs in the English scene, of a collectivist commonwealth run by an administrative oligarchy. But the "great game of politics" has always rebelled against the dominion of the meritocracy. This was particularly so in Puerto Rico, where colonialism strengthened the animus; since th colonial professional classes, denie full self-expression in other fields invested all of their energy in politics.

It would be difficult, indeed, to imagine a more inhospitable venue fo the Fabian managerial revolution tha a colonial society. The Fabian virtues, in a colonial system, becom imperialist vices. The British-traine civil servant—and Professor Goodsell notes the influence of the typ upon the Tugwell reformers—become the colonial autocrat. As Chesterto remarked of the Fabians, they wante to change capitalism not because i was an unjust kingdom but becaus it was an untidy room. The democratic spirit could resist that spirit o administrative paternalism in Londo and Washington. But, fatally weakened in a colonial society, it was re atively powerless to prevent Governo Tugwell from using Puerto Rico a an experimental laboratory for idea he could not implement elsewher If, then, his administrative reform were brilliantly successful it was because, in large part, Puerto Rico wa a colonial dependency subservient t American policies and not, as Professor Goodsell suggests, because of it tiny geographical size or the absenc of Latin militarism. It is perhap pardonable that Governor Tugwell di not see his Puerto Rican Odyssey i those terms and that, like Clive i India, he was surprised by his ow moderation. But it is less excusab that an academic observer should fa so to see it.

he Communists are uneasy to be in a coalition with Socialists who occasionally advocate revolution.

Halperin, himself of a European background, cautions against any attempt to equate the Chilean Socialists with their European counterparts. Such comparison would leave the analyst at a loss to explain why the Chilean Socialists can switch unperturbably from Marxism to Peronism to Titoism to Fidelism to Maoism, etc. Socialist flirtation with Peronism, so unthinkable in Europe, does not seem incredible in Chile where fascistic movements have been launched against the oligarchy rather than against Bolshevism.

The curious thing is that Halperin, aware as he is of the history of ideological honky-tonking of the Socialists, should take their present stance so seriously. He gives the impression that the current revolutionary line of Socialist party President Raul Ampuero will give rise to a genuinely revolutionary movement. The Socialist leaders have always been verbally committed to radical goals, but in practice remain homo Chilensis. In Chile a political guerrilla feels as silly as one would in Michigan; a Socialist party leader really prepared to undertake revolution is most unlikely.

What of the Christian Democrats who have come to power prepared to undertake a peaceful revolution? While Halperin does not venture to predict what their effectiveness is to be, he does shed some light on their rise. Jesuit priests are largely credited with having spawned the movement in the mid-1930s; not for having led it, but for having created the intellectual climate out of which it emerged. That the Christian Democrats were incubated so recently is presented as a political advantage for the reason that they did not inherit the European Socialist tradition which makes the working class the pivot of progress. The trade union movement has not been a road to power in Latin America, and the Christian Democrats would probably have been hampered in their rapid political ascent had they been burdened by what C. Wright Mills called a "labor metaphysic." They would also enjoy less voter support had they come to look with favor upon capitalism as have many of the Christian Democrats of Europe. The Chilean Christian Democrats continue to regard capitalism as an evil to be gradually replaced by a system they call "communitarianism." In the Communitarian society workers will share in management decisions and a sharp distinction between capital and labor will be erased. In fact, capital and labor are foreseen as becoming "united in the same hands." This is the Christian Democrats' answer to the class struggle of the Marxists. It will be fascinating to observe the Christian Democrats as they take on the monopolized, power-concentrated, backward capitalistic structure over which they now hold political sway.

YANKEES AND SAMURAI: America's Role in the Emergence of Modern Japan. By Foster Rhea Dulles. Harper & Row. 275 pp. $6.50.

Kenneth Lamott

Three or four years before the attack on Pearl Harbor I was invited, together with several of my classmates at the American high school in Tokyo, to attend the Black Ships Festival at Shimoda, commemorating the successful assault on Japan by Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry. (Why the festival was held at Shimoda, the seaport where Townsend Harris, the first American consul, lived, rather than at Kurihama, where Perry actually landed, is a puzzle I can no longer answer.) We were taken south from Tokyo on a fast coastwise passenger ship, fed breakfast at an inn overlooking a lovely harbor, and then obliged to sit through a day-long ceremony in the hot sun, listening to a succession of worthies remind us of the historic friendship of the United States and Japan. Although we were treated with much kindness and given many gifts, it was a perfectly dreadful day.

I was reminded of this experience while reading Foster Rhea Dulles' account of the first century of contact between the United States and Japan. Mr. Dulles is a retired professor of history at Ohio State, but his rhetoric is undistinguishable from the rhetoric of the Japanese speakers at the Black Ships Festival. "For all their mutual doubts on coming together under such unusual circumstances, Americans and Japanese discovered in 1854 a basis of enduring friendship," he writes, and again, ". . . the bonds established between Americans and Japanese in the latter half of the nineteenth century have helped to point the way, after the tragic interlude of war, to a revival of the two nations' historic friendship." I nod, I doze, and I feel the hot sun of Shimoda on my face again.

Mr. Dulles has hold of a splendid subject for a writer of popular history, and even his dogged good will cannot entirely spoil its interest. For one thing, it is a story that is so hard to excel in picturesqueness that I wonder why it has not been committed to the musical stage. A scene: Terrible-tempered "Old Matt" Perry, in full dress of blue and gold, wearing every decoration he owns and pretending to be an admiral, is seen as he goes ashore to present President Fillmore's letter to the Japanese commissioners. He is accompanied by 500 marines and sailors, two huge Negroes and a band. The route to the flag-decorated pavilion where the commissioners wait is lined by thousands of Japanese soldiers in brilliant uniforms and lacquered helmets, armed with pikes and matchlocks. The band then breaks into The Star-Spangled Banner.

Another scene: A Japanese nobleman in full regalia, silk skirts flying, clings for his life to the side of the quarter-scale steam locomotive that whirls around the circular track the American seamen have set up ashore. A later scene: At a ball in New York, the same Japanese, his disapproval of the American women's bare shoulders and bosoms overcome by a combination of concupiscence and champagne, is taught how to waltz. With one society lady after another, he spins around and around the ballroom until the break of day.

The trouble with all this—and the trouble with Mr. Dulles' book—can be summed up by turning to one of his illustrations, a reproduction of a group photograph taken by Matthew Brady of the first Japanese Trea Commission of 1860 and some of the American hosts. The top-knotted Ja anese, wearing flowing haori and h kama and carrying the samurai's tw swords, are to a man serious, solem Among the Americans, two Navy ficers stand out: head and shoulde taller than the Japanese, they a smiling, full of benevolence towa these queer little men they have be detailed to entertain. And there it the Great Cliché that has for so lo obscured the true picture of our joi history with Japan, the cliché of t American as the benevolent, disi terested teacher, and the Japanese the apt, though somewhat ungratef pupil. Mr. Dulles did not, of cour invent the cliché, but as a historian has done remarkably little towa dispelling it.

Whether he is describing Perr negotiations, or the first official Ja anese visit to the United States, or t invasion of Japan by American of cials, businessmen, teachers and m sionaries, or the experiences of t first Japanese immigrants to th country, Mr. Dulles manages to r off almost all the interesting rou edges and reduce his story to the u critical tone of an article about t Peace Corps in National Geograph It would have been truer to have wr ten that, from the beginning, our re tions with Japan have been charact ized, on both sides, by distrust, ar gance and force, and that Perry's lan ing was less a scene from a musi comedy than, as Arthur Walwor pointed out in 1946 in Black Sh Off Japan, a well-organized amphi ous operation whose spirit was cryst lized in an officer's recollection th "there was not a Yankee who did feel that with one broadside, one w whoop, and a rush upon them w cold steel, we could scatter as ma as could stand before us."

If this is a matter of some i portance, it is not merely because Dulles has contributed one more diocre book to perpetuating the my Instead, it seems to me, our confr tation with Japan is a paradigm our confrontation with other Far Ea ern countries, and it is not entir fanciful to suggest that if we are quite sure what we are doing in V nam today, one reason is that we s don't know exactly what we were ing in Japan a hundred years ago.

egulators employed in Western ommunities: profit, rate of interst for capital, rent for land, adeuate depreciation rates, rational rice fixing, credits, economic selfnterest. Today's Soviet leaders ever tire of emphasizing the neessity for using these same economic regulators, of denouncing e undue attention paid to quanty at the expense of other planing indices, and of insisting that conomic laws must take the place f administrative fiat in the conuct of industry. The new attitude lso marks the passing of the "new oviet man," who used to be promnently featured as the builder of he coming Communist society. The fficial theory was that, with the isappearance of the "exploiting lasses," this paragon would labor s devotedly for the interests of the tate as he would for his own inerests. The image has had to be eplaced by the familiar figure of economic man" who makes no ones about the fact that he will ive of his best only if assured of dequate rewards.

This extraordinary about-face n Russian economic thinking and ehavior has been hailed in the forign press as a "return to capitalsm." Such an interpretation goes o far, in view of the close conrols within which Soviet indusrialists must still work. The freeoms conferred by the charter have o be exercised within a national ystem of intensified centralization. When Mr. Khrushchev dissolved the entralized branch ministries in 957, he replaced them by more han 100 regional economic counils (cut to less than fifty in 1962), which administered industry on a erritorial basis. In 1965, his sucessors reversed the process, disolving the councils and setting up wenty-eight centralized ministries nd committees, each to be responible for every aspect of operation in given branch of industry. Mr. Kosyin was quick to insist that the new ministries would operate under the onditions of greatly increased local utonomy written into the charter, hat they would have duties toward, s well as rights over, the suborinate enterprises. Nevertheless, the ew administrative structure is centralized and concentrated.

In addition, planning controls lay down the industrialist's basic tasks. He receives precise instructions on the amount of production, the assortment of products, the total profit and rate of profitability, what payments are to be made to the state budget and what allocations received from it, the quantity of new capacity to be installed in the planned period.

For all that, the rules of the game are changed and we may expect that the results will also be different. Before turning to the probable outcome, however, a little should be said of agriculture and distribution, sectors of the economy where corresponding changes are being installed.

During the decades of Stalinist concentration on industry, particularly the heavy branches, the interests of agriculture were grossly neglected. Stalin secured power over agricultural production by forcing the peasants to join collective farms in the late 1920s and the early 1930s. He then used that power to extract everything he could from the land, giving little or nothing in return, and devoted the proceeds to his industrial plans. The destruction of incentive, the running down of the mechanics of production, the continuing low level of productivity have forced his successors to an impressive change of policy. The new policy was apparent by 1953, when Khrushchev began to channel more capital investments, more machinery, more fertilizers into agriculture, raised farm prices and lowered the cost of fuel, consumer goods and other necessities sold to the farmers. One of his last acts was to bring rural workers within the scope of a national insurance scheme.

In his new deal for agriculture, announced in March, 1965, Brezhnev went even further. All of Khrushchev's methods were continued and intensified. Brezhnev not only increased prices for grain bought by the state and lowered the quantities the farmers were required to deliver; he also stabilized these amounts for a period of six years, so that producers could plan ahead with confidence. In further measures he transferred to government account the burden of land improvement, and canceled outright various forms of farm indebtedness to the state bank and the government. Unlike Khrushchev, the new rulers have gone out of their way to encourage the working of small private plots. Instead of being denounced as a "speculator," the farmer is to be helped to increase production on his plot and to sell it on the open market at the best price he can get.

In August, 1965, the government showed further awareness of the need to stimulate individual energy and initiative among the mass of the farmers. The chief agricultural expert of a state farm in Siberia was allowed to publicize his views that the stimulation could be achieved only by transferring legal ownership of the land from the farm as a whole to the much smaller zveno or "link," comprising some four to six peasant families, who actually worked the land. So far there has been no follow-up to this audacious proposal, which would strike at the roots of the collective system. Meanwhile the stagnation in agricultural production remains the basic problem for Russia's rulers, who have twice had to make incursions into the world wheat market (in 1963 and again in 1965) in order to feed the growing population.

most directly and strongly felt in the distribution sector—pose problems as intractable as those in industry and agriculture. In Stalinist days, when demand was rigorously held down, the producer of consumer goods had few problems. He turned out the goods allotted to him — clothing, footwear, textiles, household appliances—and worried very little about style, quality, durability or appearance. Practically all goods were scarce and stocks were cleared out as soon as they reached the shops. Now, the very success of industrialization is creating difficulties. There are far larger stocks in the shops, and with the development of the chemical industry and the growing output of synthetics, new attractive goods appear every day. The people who buy have also changed. Their demands are far more diverse; they are far more "choosy." They skim off the most fashionable and best quality items, and leave the rest to pile up in shops and warehouses, involving the state in alarming monetary losses.

This unsatisfactory situation is being met by loosening controls, establishing direct contacts between producers and distributors, and studying the wishes of consumers. The first modest indications of "consumer sovereignty" came in 1962, when the manager of a successful footwear factory in Lvov conceived the idea of increasing efficiency by something that resembled a capitalist "take-over bid." His efficient plant became the administrative and technical headquarters of a group in which a number of footwear concerns that had been doing less well became specialized branches. The enlarged organization, known as a "Soviet firm," was able to set up services which had not existed before, such as devising new styles and studying the tastes of consumers through the firm's own retail outlets. The movement achieved great success and spread rapidly all over the country, to include factories turning out clothing, cardboard and paper, cement, household crockery, furs, medical equipment, etc.

More recently, prominence has been given to the idea of establishing direct links between production and trade. Two garment factories, Mayak (Lighthouse) in Gorky, and Bolshevichka in Moscow, were freed from planning controls and allowed to operate on the basis of only two criteria — their ability to run at a profit and to fulfill satisfactorily orders received from bodies marketing their products. Here again the success was spectacular, and the system is being quickly extended to other clothing factories.

But the Russians are finding that there is much more to distribution than conferring new freedoms on producers and sellers. The long years of neglect have left the light industries and the state trading network without the physical means to do a good job. There is a serious shortage of equipment to handle new materials, such as those containing a proportion of synthetics. The forthright woman director of Mayak recently described the condition of her trust in this respect as "pathetic." There is a chronic shortage of packaging materials—paper, cardboard, boxes, aluminum foil and the like. Warehouses are badly equipped, they lack storage space; there is not enough mechanized equipment to move, load and unload goods. Shops are still too few, and existing ones are often too small to serve their customers well. Mayak conducted a questionnaire in the summer of 1965 in its own retail store. On the day chosen some 1,400 customers came into the shop, only 250 of whom completed their purchases. Of the unsatisfied remainder, about half did not like the styles or colors available, the other half failed to find their sizes, or were frightened off by the prices. Plans were immediately set afoot to enlarge the capacity of the store at least five times, in order to stock a broader range and assortment of goods.

The absence of scientifically based market research has been de-

producers pass resolutions callin for an All-Union body, with infoı mation centers in every town an district, to supply them with th data they need to maneuver thei output in accordance with fluctua tions of demand. The drawing up c effective contracts between prc ducers and sellers of consume

a wide knowledge of the kind c goods in demand, familiar with th costs of transporting, storing an selling the items they handle. Ol viously people of this background d not now exist in sufficient numbeı in the Soviet Union. An intensiv program is needed to train then and to improve the physical bas of the light industries and the trac ing network before the "revolutior in distribution can take effect.

In a country as large and d verse as Russia it is all too easy fc government measures to fall ini disuse. Only last year a new decre on agriculture was passed which di no more than reiterate the princ ples of a 1955 decree that had r quired central planners and admi istrative bodies to confine ther selves to laying down general c rectives, and allow the farme themselves to decide by what mea their duties were to be fulfilled. O ficials had continued to issue d tailed instructions, and the new la imposed severe penalties in an e fort to deter them.

There is plenty of evidence th the government's present aim of e couraging local autonomy within tl framework of the state plan is b ing resisted by officials who are u willing to relinquish the power th have held for many years, and assume new duties and responsibi

s. Russians are no exception to rule that people adopt new men-attitudes toward their work with greatest reluctance. Khrushchev quently criticized officials who re holding up progress because y were "imprisoned by the old ditions and habits," and his sucsors are having to make the ne reproaches.

Having dismantled Stalin's "com-nd" economy and abandoned rxist economic doctrine in favor an economy based essentially on fitability, the government is pro-ding on cautious, experimental es. The present approach is total-unlike the "campaign" method of lier years, when the nation's en-ies were forcibly concentrated on main objective after another, the conviction that all problems ist yield to this energetic treat-nt.

One important issue on which the vernment's changed attitude of ition and compromise is strongmarked is the setting of prices.
ademician Nemchinov had prosed to substitute for the existing itralized method a "three-tier" stem such as has already been opted in Czechoslovakia. The te itself would fix prices for only mall number of important goods.
would next settle a range within ich prices could be varied by al enterprises for all except the sic major items. Enterprises could mselves price mass-production ods as long as they adhered to proved methods of calculation.
t although the Soviet Govern-nt now fully accepts the prin-le that prices must reflect truth-ly the labor, material and other sts required to produce the comdities to which they are attached, sygin held out no prospect of id progress toward local autonny. A state committee has been up to consider the whole matter, d action will not become appart before 1967 or 1968. Unless the lustrialist is allowed to charge ces that cover his costs and in-re the profits on which he relies his new mode of working, his ater operative freedom will necsarily be limited for lack of funds.

This does not obscure the fact it, even if the government wanted hold back reform, harsh economic ilities would prevent it from do-so. The warning is clear in the nds of recent years—the slowing down of the rate of growth of industrial production and of national income, the dangerous stagnation in agricultural output, the losses inflicted by consumer resistance to poor-quality goods. None of these can be counteracted without a continuance of the new methods.

Irreversible change is no less clear in the people who carry out the government's plans. Industrialization has created an entirely new class in Russia — technicians, engineers, scientists, economists, specialists in automation and cybernetics. There are more than 2 million of them working in industry alone, and they are essential to the running of an economy that is vastly larger and more complex than it was before the war. They demand a climate of opinion in which they can freely exercise their skills, and refuse to be dominated by methods and dogma that are at variance with the facts of economic life. Nothing has been more striking throughout the conferences and debates on the reforms than the new note of boldness and confidence in the speeches of the practical men and women who are faced with the day-to-day problems of getting things done.

Progress in the neglected sectors of agriculture and distribution is likely to be slower than in industry, mainly because of the difficulty of channeling funds into these spheres of operation with sufficient speed and in sufficient quantities to make up for past deficiencies. Russia's resources are not unlimited, and the weight of defense expenditure, including the cost of its technically brilliant achievements in space, reduces the area within which those in charge of economic policy are able to maneuver. But the penalties for failure have political as well as economic implications. From the inception of the revolution, Russia has been proclaiming that socialism is able to provide a higher standard of living for the population than capitalism can hope to do. So far practice has lagged notably behind theory. Promises of a better life for its much-deprived citizens cannot be indefinitely postponed without unfortunate repercussions both within and outside Russia's borders.

For the managerial class the reforms represent an immense improvement in the conditions under which they previously worked, and a degree of freedom which probably feels to them as great as that enjoyed by their opposite numbers in capitalist societies. What impact this freedom will have on industrial efficiency remains to be seen, but it is bound to be considerable. There is no mention of competition as an economic regulator: it is believed, presumably, that the new material and moral incentives will stimulate Soviet economy as competition stimulates capitalist economies. For consumers in general, the reforms hold out the prospect of a slow but steady movement toward a more comfortable life which, again against the background of their own experience, must eventually act as a powerful incentive to greater efficiency.

The difficulties and limitations with which Russia's economic reforms are beset will make for uneven progress, but will do nothing to turn back the tide. Insofar as the changes infuse rationality into the working of the economy, and enthrone reason in place of doctrine, they may be expected to remove many barriers to understanding between East and West. At the same time they will sharpen the economic rivalry between the two systems by striking off many of the shackles that have prevented Russia's citizens from contributing their full share to the fulfillment of national aspirations.

Secondly, Wilhelm suggests that Johnson wants to appear to be a great economizer. . . . He seems to believe that the $4 billion annual pay increase, proposed by McNamara, would offset this appearance. Would it? If we accept McNamara's $4 billion figure . . . Johnson can promise a $6 billion tax cut and do away with the draft for $4 billion. . . . Wilhelm's theories, however, become more acceptable when he personally estimates the cost at something over $9 billion.

Tom Lyons, Bard College

Dear Sirs: Mr. Wilhelm contends that the "armed forces are meeting the bulk of their manpower needs through voluntary enlistments." This is true, but what is not disclosed is that the draft law itself acts as a goad or spur to enlistments. Without a draft law on the books it is highly problematical whether any of the services could come close to meeting manpower needs. . . .

Even more important, should the services fail to meet manpower needs, the simplest and easiest solution would be to substitute a variety of tactical nuclear weapons in lieu of missing companies, battalions and brigades. This in turn would limit flexibility of response and practically guarantee any encounter from becoming nuclear and quickly getting out of hand.

Mr. Wilhelm makes a basic assumption that the draft per se is bad. This is a debatable point. As a former regular officer who has commanded many draftees, I've observed many thousands of more or less dead-end kids end up two years of military life not only in far better physical shape than at induction but as far more useful and productive citizens to the nation. . . .

Paris, France

Dear Sirs: Three developments have occurred since I sent you my article on the political situation in France following de Gaulle's announcement of his intention to stand for re-election [The Nation, Nov. 29].

1. The rival candidates have had more extensive use of radio and TV than in any previous campaign. This has given the race a liveliness that is unusual under the Fifth Republic.

2. When I wrote, Lecanuet's candidacy had just been announced and little was known about him. Since then he has made quite a hit on TV, and has been particularly effective with his "Europeanism." He may get far more Right and Center votes than seemed likely two weeks ago.

3. De Gaulle, largely as a result of Lecanuet's speeches, has become aware of the strong feelings on the Europe issue and, through his ministers, is taking a much less stiff-necked attitude on the Common Market. He pointedly talked with Heath, the British Conservative leader, for more than an hour, the implication being that he would welcome Britain's entry into the Common Market on that non-supranational basis which the British also prefer.

I indicated that it was possible de Gaulle would not win re-election in the first round. The likelihood of a run-off election now seems even more probable.

Basis of competence

East Lansing, Mich.

Dear Sirs: I compliment you for inviting Samuel Adams Darcy to review Marxism and Strange Communists I Have Known [The Nation, Nov. 8]. It is a very good review, and your choice of the reviewer is a courageous contribution to the development of an atmosphere in which literary contributors can be chosen on the basis of competence.

Some quotes

Los Angeles, Calif.

Dear Sirs: In an interview on his 75th birthday, Dwight D. Eisenhower expressed his dismay about the demonstrations against the war in Vietnam and said: "You know, I've even got so I hate the word 'intelligentsia.' "

On a previous occasion Eisenhower said: "I hate war as only a soldier who has lived it can, only as one who has seen its brutality, its futility, its stupidity."

A contemporary of Eisenhower, Albert Einstein, had this to say on intelligentsia and on hate: "The 'intellectuals' . . . have . . . a particularly strong influence on the formation of public opinion. . . . Those who are about to lead us toward an authoritarian government are particularly concerned with intimidating and muzzling that group.

"Arrows of hate have been shot at me, too: but they never hit me, because somehow they belonged to another world, with which I have no connection whatsoever."

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Jack Newfield's insights into SDS ["Idealism and Action"; The Nation, Nov. 8] are marred by a number of errors, most of them minor but a few of importance.

(1) I must confess that I am not now, and have not been for six months, an SDS staff member, though I do put a lot of time into the organization.

(2) True, Jeff Shero and I were harassed by Chicago cops in October, but Jeff was not ticketed and my ticket, though unjust, was a shadow case. That the national office has been under surveillance is beyond doubt . . . but it makes little sense for us or for Newfield to over-dramatize the pettier annoyances when the society has so many subtler and more powerful devices at its command.

(3) Newfield is guilty of big-city chauvinism when he writes that "Those members on small, rural campuses in Kansas and Oklahoma are only vaguely liberal and probably unable to distinguish between a Sparticist and a narcissist." There are many of those, of course, as there are in the cities; but I've been more struck by the sophistication and depth of SDS people from such places. Their radicalism has Populist roots and an integrity of its own. . . . By the way, what is the difference between a Sparticist and a narcissist?

(4) There is a reference, presumably from someone in the SDS office, to "poor schnooks who burn draft cards." I don't think this remark reflects general opinion in the organization, certainly not among the "leadership." Rather, I think most of us would say that the decision to burn the prized piece of paper is a tactical one, one of many possibilities, probably not the most effective in most circumstances but maybe more so in some. . . . We certainly have no respect for the piece of paper, and we think the burners are more saints than schnooks.

eturning from Vietnam, Secretary McNamara deed at his airport press conference that we are no er losing the war in that unhappy country. Perhaps embering his earlier forecast that we could start ing out our troops at the end of 1965, he avoided lictions of victory in the foreseeable future. He e only of the increasing infiltration of forces from th Vietnam and promised a further build-up of erican ground action and aerial bombing. We now about 170,000 men in Vietnam. Newspaper esti-es run to a doubling of that number during 1966, that projected force, if one relies on the usual nise that a ratio of 10 to 1 is required to extinguish uerrilla insurrection, will still be far from ade-te. As for bombing, Joseph Alsop, the dean of the icose commentators and possessor of good sources nformation, writes that a monthly drop of 10,000 is to be raised to a "vertiginous" average of 40,- tons, calculated to make the jungle and swamp eats of the enemy "absolutely untenable." And to e out a few hundred more villages inhabited by South Vietnamese peasants, whose freedom is so ious to us.

hese plans are bad news for the Vietcong and the th Vietnamese, as is the dispatch to Vietnamese ers of two exceptionally powerful vessels, both lear-powered—the aircraft carrier Enterprise and missile-launching cruiser Bainbridge. It is also bad
s for the American people, who must pay the cost, in lives and money, of what General de Gaulle
s "this absurd war." An apparently automatic proc-irreversible as death, is under way. The protests sensible minority are heard, and instantly thrust le. The lessons of the past are remembered—and red. The majority of the people are apathetic, much their forebears were when whole populations were ed out by the Black Death. And so the other mi-ity—the shouters for victory, cost what it may—vide a semblance of national unity for the Johnson ninistration's purposes.

he Administration, however, may in the course of coming year find itself among the recipients of news. The war which it has extended so far bed its earlier bounds is not popular. Normally, war ngs with it a release from the routine of life, and exhilaration that comes from participation in great nts. The ecstasy of patriotism compensates to some ent for the deprivations and bloodshed. Not this
e. In this conflict there is nothing of the steely olution to which Churchill summoned the people of tain when German invasion seemed imminent, none the righteous anger which Pearl Harbor provoked ong the American people. All but the most thought-find more to disgust than to edify in what the ited States is doing in Southeast Asia, and those intellectuals who support the Administration's policy are doing little more than regurgitate the anti-Communist slogans of the fifties. In our previous wars, some have stood aside on grounds of conscience, but in what other war waged by the United States have Americans, however in the minority, offered active resistance or wished for a victory by the other side?

Mr. Johnson gambled on quickly subduing the Vietcong and their allies by bringing the latest military technology into play. That gamble he has already lost. There may still be some sort of negotiated settlement before next year's elections. If there is not, Richard Nixon is quite right: the failure to win will become a major election issue, and the outcome at the polls may not bear out Mr. Johnson's reputation for political acumen.

The Duty of Congress

Frustration is the spur to invention. A case in point is the recent innovation by Representatives Robert Kastenmeier of Wisconsin; Benjamin Rosenthal, William F. Ryan and Joseph V. Resnick of New York; William Broomfield (a Republican) and Charles G. Diggs of Michigan, and a few other members of Congress. Instead of bemoaning the failure of the majority in both houses of Congress to meet their responsibilities by debating the issues of the war in Vietnam, these legislators took steps to fill the vacuum. They organized public discussions of these issues in their own districts. Of course, such hearings are in no way a substitute for Congressional action, but neither are they a mere stopgap. They could become a valuable supplement to the legislative process and a channel for closer communication between Congressmen and their constituents. Of greater immediate inportance, they can help to force debate in Congress where the members, fearful that any questioning of the Administration's Asian policy might damage their own political fortunes, have acquiesced in a conspiracy of silence.

Mr. Kastenmeier has published a 160-page paperback, Vietnam Hearings—Voices from the Grass Roots ($1.50 from Representative Kastenmeier's office), which is a record of the proceedings in Madison, Wis., over which he presided. A broad spectrum of opinion found expression. Among individuals and organizations participating were the University of Wisconsin Student-Faculty Committee to End War in Vietnam; Young Americans for Freedom; Prof. William Appleman Williams; Reserve Officers Association of the U.S.; Wisconsin Scientists, Engineers and Physicians for Johnson and Humphrey; Military Order of the World Wars; American Legion; Madison DuBois Club; and many others. Perhaps Professor Williams said what most needed saying when, in countering the argument that, right or wrong, we are committed and must see it through, he termed such counsel part of a broader pattern of self-deception. Human beings are prone, when a major mistake has been made, to lie to themselves. Williams suggested that it is long past time that we renounce our self-deceptive lies about Vietnam.

Of course those most prone to this weakness are the least likely to know it, and we may assume that few opinions were changed at Madison or elsewhere. But there is another reason for the deepening rift between the pro-war or apathetic majority and the disaffected minority: the main positions are too far apart, morally and politically, to be reconciled. The pro-war view reflects the Administration stand that the conflict in Vietnam is not a civil war but an attack by the Communists of North Vietnam and China on the freedom-loving people of South Vietnam, and that American solicitude for these victims, as well as our own national interest, requires fighting with all our resources until the aggressors are forced to their just punishment at the negotiating table. The anti-war conviction is that the United States is carrying on the latest of a series of counterrevolutionary operations, in a crusade not only against communism but against all movements for economic and political liberation.

The split along this fission line is probably the most serious and portentous since the Civil War, and its outcome will affect the whole future direction of American democracy. Convinced that democracy cannot survive a continuation of the cold war at its present pitch of virulence, the anti-war party must and will persist in its opposition. Yet this course is fraught with danger alike for its members and the freedoms they cherish. Although the Administration and some of its allies declare their support of the right of dissent, this tolerance is not likely to survive the strains of a prolonged war in Asia. The identification of dissent with treason is the normal reaction to the exacerbations of such a conflict, and signs of its approach were not lacking in the right-wing speeches at Madison. Thus the meetings sounded a warning of approaching internal conflict, and emphasized the need, in simple prudence, for full-dress hearings on Vietnam when the second session of the 89th Congress convenes.

Nuclear Weapons for Germany

November was the month of revelations. First came Eric Sevareid's disclosure, not novel to newsmen, that a 1964 North Vietnam offer to talk peace had been rejected because Secretary Rusk's antennae were insufficiently activated. Then we were informed that with all the debate about sharing nuclear weapons with our NATO allies, unpublicized sharing has been in effect since 1958. In 1960, after an inspection trip to Europe, a subcommittee of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, in a still top-secret report to incoming President Kennedy, pointed up the "inadequate" custody being exercised over the weapons and recommended "tighter" physical and electronic controls (John W. Finney, The New York Times, November 28). At the same time, Secretary McNamara (whose peregrinations are always bad news for the Ameri people and usually for the countries he visits) reve in Paris that more than 5,000 U.S. nuclear warhe are currently stored on European soil in suppor NATO forces, in addition to an arsenal of more t 5.000 nuclear weapons of the U.S. Strategic For Yet this total in excess of 10,000—which does not clude a probably far greater number of non-nuc warheads and bombs in various parts of the worl is not accounted adequate for the defense of Eur and Mr. McNamara promised a 20 per cent increas the NATO nuclear arsenal within the next six mon

A feeble effort was made to assure apprehen Americans that "permissive action links" could be lied on to prevent unauthorized use of the nuc weapons assigned to NATO forces. We are told German F-104 fighter-bombers armed with U.S. clear warheads sit on a ramp behind a barricade wh can be lowered only at American command. An American sentries stand by to see that the Ger pilots cannot enter their cockpits without Ameri permission. Finally, an electronic signal from an Ar ican command post is required to arm the warhe The Joint Congressional Committee concedes these controls are not "foolproof," but in its opi they are about as tight as the present state of t nology can devise.

On the basis of this necessarily vague descript and the fantastic proliferation of nuclear devices, explosion of one or more can be confidently predic It takes only a modicum of military and techn understanding to show that the "permissive ac links" are aptly named—they are more permis than prohibitive. The sum of the physical precaut is obviously ineffective against conspiracy, with without the use of force. For instance, a group of Nazi plotters could demolish the barricade and o power the sentries, or agreeable arrangements to same end might be worked out between Germans American sympathizers. American connivance m not be necessary, since the Germans fly the F-104 maneuvers, but neither can it be ruled out. It wil recalled that soon after the Russians acquired nuc weapons, a USAF general offered in a public spe to bomb the Soviet "atom nests" and declared when Christ heard his defense He would absolve reward him. Such mentalities are capable of act scarcely conceivable to rational minds.

But what about the electronic safeguard? It is wise vulnerable to conspiratorial action, and Ger American arrangements to circumvent the phys safeguards could include transmitting the signal w arms the warheads. But the guardians could ren loyal and the signal could be transmitted from ano source, the code having previously been broken by of a number of possible methods—spying, cryp raphy, inspection of the receiving device, or ot Or the signal might be rendered unnecessary, the ing devices having been internally by-passed or m fied for manual operation. The only defense is no one should try to do it, and that is no defens

If they are given the problem, German electronics ineers can solve it; since the 19th century, they e been second to none in the world. Since World r II, thousands of engineer-years have been ex- ded in a seesaw between radar measures and coun- neasures—all classified secret, and all known to ultitude of technicians.

Ir. Finney quotes members of the committee as ing plaintively: What more does Germany want, way? What they want is to "participate" in weapons tems capable of hitting the medium-range ballis- missiles zeroed in on the cities and military instal- ons of West Germany. "Participation" in surface ps armed with Polaris missiles might satisfy them— the time being. But when it comes to weapons, the mans are never satisfied for long. With participa- culminating in control, nuclear weapons might e them the victory which eluded them in 1918 and 5.

t is inherent in the nature of democracy that the ple themselves can emasculate or destroy it. The ple themselves can interfere with the right of mi- ities "peaceably to assemble and petition the gov- ment for a redress of grievances"; they can frus- e the right of individuals and corporations to en- e in trade with Communist states, though that de may be sanctioned by government policy; they mete out private punishment for personal beliefs acts of conscience which run counter to current itical frenzies. Abuses of this kind are not new; they e born with the Republic and the problem was fore- n by the founding fathers. But two World Wars e increased the danger, and the endless cold war, of whose pretexts is that democracy is menaced m abroad, actually threatens it at home.

Thus the breakdown of official law and order in tions of the South, where the anti-Communist slo- ns of the cold war are a staple of racism, is paral- d by individual and organizational infringements ecting all races and breaking out in all parts of the ntry. Under color of the right of the individual to as he will with his property, meeting places are used to dissenters; even more ironical, insurance tracts have been canceled on the ground that the ses of dissenters are particularly subject to arson vandalism. Under color of the individual's right work or not to work, longshoremen, organized in the st corrupt unions in the country, refuse to load and load ships—and that on moral and religious unds. They submit to the leadership of notorious gsters, but handling a cargo consigned to or from Soviet Union or Poland is an intolerable offense their honor.

In an extension of this intermittent crusading spirit, ne bus drivers balked at transporting passengers the November 27 SANE anti-war demonstration Washington. According to Homer Bigart, writing in e New York Times (November 27), the New Jersey Conference of Amalgamated Transit Union forced the cancellation of agreements between SANE and three major bus companies, on the ground that the drivers are war veterans who "feel that what these people are doing is giving aid and comfort to the enemy." In some cases car pools had to be hurriedly organized when the drivers drove away in their empty buses on learning that the passengers were not going to a football game.

SANE filed complaints with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the National Labor Relations Board, charging a conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade. Although this action involves a diversion of SANE's scanty resources, it should be followed up and assistance should be forthcoming from public-spirited organizations and individuals. If the bus drivers can refuse service because the political views of riders do not conform with their own, why should not "patriotic" telegraph operators decline to transmit messages of protest against the war, or printers refuse to set type because the content of a book, article or editorial is not to their liking? This discrimination is used by political illiterates (to put the most charitable construction on their actions) to deprive American citizens of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The misbehavior of the drivers did not go entirely unchallenged within the industry. John Gallagher, the proprietor of the Community Bus Company of Allwood, New Jersey, told Homer Bigart he was "very distressed" when his drivers, who belong to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, refused to operate five buses that were to have transported demonstrators to Washington from the New York University campus in the Bronx. Mr. Gallagher stressed that neither he nor his family are pacifists. He simply felt that a bus company ought to transport anybody anywhere, regardless of race, color or creed. "We don't ask our passengers why they are going someplace," he said. "We are there to serve. We rode the Freedom March and others, some we didn't like."

Mr. Gallagher understands democracy. His drivers don't.

The Art Wagon

The Los Angeles County Museum of Art, whose three-building new premises were dedicated last March, has lost its director under circumstances that have attracted national attention and that make the future contribution of this ambitious new repository problematical. Briefly, Dr. Richard Brown did not please the institution's board of trustees and his resignation was requested. He could not be fired out of hand, because the County Museum is a state facility and the director is a civil servant; but neither could he stay in the face of implacable trustee hostility, because the museum is one of those public facilities that depend heavily on private support. The trustees, men of wealth, made clear that they understood the leverage of money.

Dr. Brown had become offensive, in particular, to one of the most affluent of the patrons: Howard Ahmanson, owner of the Home Savings and Loan Association (the world's largest). The director had declined to name the new museum complex for Ahmanson, had refused to employ Mr. Ahmanson's pet architect (a man noted for gold-leaf bank façades) as its designer and (perhaps the most painful blow) could not bring himself to hang in the museum Mr. Ahmanson's collection of dubious old masters.

The official complaint made of Dr. Brown is that he lacks administrative ability, but despite the wide discussion of the issue no specific instances of his shortcomings have been made public. Further, Dr. Brown has left Los Angeles to accept the directorship of the new Kimball Art Foundation, now under construction in Fort Worth, so his deficiencies are apparently not thought crippling in museum circles. It might be added that if an administrator was needed in Los Angeles they are much easier to find than art directors, and Dr. Brown never suggested that he would resist the addition of such a man to his staff—though he did, quite understandably, refuse to accept a business ma ager who would report directly to the trustees.

In a sense, Dr. Brown—and more seriously the p ple of Los Angeles—are victims of the culture "exp sion." Culture has become "big league," "big mone a bandwagon phenomenon. And men who have pr pered by grabbing front seats on bandwagons jumping aboard the art wagon. The Los Angeles pleasantness is only the most acute and widely p licized of situations that exist today in many of t country's museums and related halls of culture. The is no easy answer to the conflict of money with tas power with knowledge, manipulation with professio integrity. One can only hope that as America becom accustomed to the idea that it is possessed of cult as well as know-how, men of wealth will learn to s port creative excellence without assuming that th can buy it. It is men like Dr. Brown who will tea them—and the trustees in Los Angeles will learn th first lesson when they try to find a man of his cali to replace him.

LBJ and the Negro Vote

Case of the Missing Registrars

William Leon Higg

Time is running out down South and the Johnson Administration seems oblivious of the deadline.

It is all too easy to assume that the right to vote means an automatic participation in government. With the Voting Rights Act now law, the Negro will have his full citizenship—so the theory goes. But look at the facts: In the Senate of the United States nine of the sixteen standing committees are chaired by Southerners. These chairmanships are the bedrock of the South's historical hegemony in the upper body of the Congress. Of these nine committee chairmen, six will be running for re-election in 1966; only three will face the electorate in 1968. Election is for six years.

The message is clear: The South's racist-oriented power base must be broken in 1966, or extended until 1972. The nation as a whole has a vital interest in the fate of the Southern bloc in Congress; its power is not illusory — it really exists. American foreign policy provides a good example. Richard Russell of Georgia is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee with jurisdiction over the nation's military establishment. Mendel Rivers of South Carolina is Russell's counterpart on the House side. Otto Passman of Louisiana chairs the powerful foreign aid subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee and (until LBJ put the heat on) wielded a heavy ax on foreign-aid budgets. Passman's Louisiana colleague, Edward Hebert, is the third-ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee; and John Sparkman of Alabama is vice chairman of the historically decisive Senate Foreign Relations Committee (behind fellow Southerner William Fulbright of Arkansas). These men have in common huge unregistered Negro constituencies.

The roll call of the '66 Senators and the chairmanships they hold is revealing. In addition to Russell, John McClellan of Arkansas presides over the Government Operations Committee; Allen Ellender Louisiana, over the Agricultu Committee; Everett Jordan of No Carolina, the Rules Committe Willis Robertson of Virginia, t Banking and Currency Committe and—deserving special emphasis James O. Eastland of Mississippi in the chair of the Judiciary Co mittee.

The three '68 chairmen — F bright; Lister Hill of Alabama, l bor and Public Welfare; Russ Long of Louisiana, chairman-p spective of the Senate Finan Committee—all belong to a m moderate breed of Southern p tician.

Viewed as a whole—and not terms of seniority influence — Senate yields a similar picture. twenty-two Southern Senato twelve must run again in 19 (This includes three special el tions.) Eight seats are in the class and five in the '70 class.

In the House of Represen tives, the entire membership elected every two years, and Southern Representatives are l insulated from the new South Negro voter. But even here a f ure to have effective Negro part

William Leon Higgs, who was the first attorney for James Meredith, was the only white lawyer in Mississippi representing Negroes in civil rights cases when he left that state (under pressure) in 1963. He now lives in Washington. Mr. Higgs has appeared for the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, SNCC, and has been a consultant with CORE, SDS and other groups.

n in the 1966 elections will n a delay until 1968. Two years eternity to the leaping aspira- ; of the Southern civil rights ement.

nd time is even shorter than polling calendar would suggest. he South, the Democratic pri- ies are normally the decisive ests. In most cases, they occur ral months before the Novem- general elections. The Alabama Florida primaries will be held May 3, 1966; and the "average" the nine primary dates works somewhere in June. This cuts deadline for achieving a mean- ul impact of the Voting Rights to about six months from the ent time, and even that is gen- ıs.

oters don't just vote for un- wns; they cast a ballot for can- ates. And a candidate must qual- in order to get on the primary ot. In Dixie, the cutoff date is cally one to two months before ction Day. For the potential can- ate, and thus for the would-be gro voter, the countdown in Southern primaries has now pped to a mere four or five nths. Moreover, it takes time to a successful political cam- gn, to finance it, and sound out support.

he opportunities for change are now evident. Already some hot primary battles are shaping up. It looks as though Governor Carl Sanders will run against Senator Russell in Georgia, former Democratic National Committeeman Camille Gravel against Senator Ellender in Louisiana, and Senator Sparkman against Governor Wallace or Republican Rep. James Martin in Alabama. A continued supply of substantial 1966 challengers to the Southern barons in the Congress will be directly tied to the Negro registration in the next few months.

A related development waits in the wings. The defeat of the Congressional challenge of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party on September 17 may be only a prelude to a score or more such challenges in both Houses of the Congress after the 1966 elections. Prolonged failure of the Administration to enforce the Voting Rights Act could create a real donnybrook as violations of the act mushroom. A big slice of national power may well be at issue, including Eastland's Senate Judiciary chairmanship, Russell's Senate Armed Services chairmanship and Mendel Rivers' House Armed Services chairmanship.

The important state and local elections are an indispensable part of the picture. Alabama's primary elections for state and local offices will be held on the same day as the Congressional primary. Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia also schedule important state or local elections in 1966. Better education, justice, jobs and much else are riding on the election fortunes of governors, sheriffs, mayors, judges and school boards.

The Administration's stingy deployment of federal registrars is aggravating franchise enforcement problems. The civil remedies of the Voting Rights Act are largely dependent upon the presence of the registrars. An instance is the act's most potent compliance measure—denying certification to the election results. The remedy does not apply at all if the registrars have not been present in advance in the political subdivision. Criminal penalties will probably be of little or no value. Judging by a solid past record, the Justice Department won't even bother to prosecute.

It follows from all this that much of the meaning of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 will be lost for as long as six years unless pervasive use of the act is made before early spring of 1966. Enforcing the act has proved to be a surprisingly taxing assignment for the Administration. It can send troops half way around the world "to bring democracy" to Vietnam, but is apparently baffled by the logistics of dispatching federal registrars a few hundred miles to achieve the domestic variety of self-rule. Only the strongest of pressures from the civil rights movement have been able to shake loose the pitifully few federal registrars now in thirty-two Southern counties.

What's the problem? No one seems to know for sure, but the few suggested answers are not very flattering to Mr. Johnson and his Attorney General. A columnist syndicated in Mississippi recently characterized as "a closely guarded secret" an understanding between the Administration and Senator Eastland to station only a token number of federal registrars in Mississippi. Many civil rights people believe that similar unrecorded pacts exist throughout the six states and thirty-four North Carolina counties covered by the act — principally with the Senators from those states. Any such possible agreements aside, it is undeniable that the power of the President to send or to withhold federal registrars from a Southern Senator's or Congressman's district is a formidable political weapon. And it is similarly obvious that if the law were impartially enforced this leverage would be lost.

In October, the Administration withdrew the federal registrars in Bolivar County, Miss., a day or two after they had opened their doors for business. Bolivar County is the "backdoor" to Senator Eastland's plantation and, like his home county of Sunflower, has one of the heaviest Negro populations in Mississippi, almost none of whom are registered to vote.

Presidential civil rights activity—of a diversionary nature—has not been lacking. Two months ago the Administration announced that Negro attorney Wiley Branton of Pine Bluff, Ark., would be transferred to the Justice Department to oversee Voting Rights Act developments. Branton had been the director of Vice President Humphrey's Council on Equal Opportunity that does the top-level coordinating of federal civil rights programs. Widely interpreted as a Johnson rebuff to Katzenbach's methodical reluctance to employ federal registrars, the Branton appointment has produced little change. The Attorney General continues to tout the "voluntary compliance" of local Southern registrars.

With much fanfare the "planning session" for a spring White House Conference on Equal Opportunity was held November 17-18 at the new Washington Hilton. The closed meeting roundly condemned the Administration's refusal to use significant numbers of federal registrars and demanded immediate action in voting and all other fields. Hubert Humphrey was the principal speaker and encountered some of the heaviest flak of his illustrious career. Many of the 200 delegates were openly disgusted by the idea of "planning" for a spring conference when anyone but a fool knew what had to be done right away.

The Administration itself isn't the only brake on Mr. Johnson's use of the Voting Rights Act. The Democratic Party and the Democratical National Committee are playing roles in the molasses-slow "crusade." Acting under authority of the 1964 Atlantic City convention resolution which ordered desegregation of the Southern branch of the party by the time of the 1968 conclave, the National Committee's Equal Rights Subcommittee asked for advice from civil rights organizations and others directly interested. At a hearing held in Washington's Mayflower Hotel on October 6, Clarence Mitchell of the NAACP led a parade of frustrated witnesses. Two themes dominated the testimony: Give us more federal registrars and desegregate the Democratic Party now. Resourcefully, Chairmen David Lawrence of the subcommittee and John Bailey of the National Committee pointed out that federal registrars were the responsibility of Attorney General Katzenbach. Shifting gears, the two chairmen then sympathetically disclaimed any National Committee authority to desegregate the Southern wing of the party prior to issuing the call for the 1968 convention. This same committee in 1948 had found ample authority to throw out the rebel Mississippi Dixiecrats and to recognize the Mississippi loyalists.

Former Governor Lawrence (of Pennsylvania) seemed unable to comprehend the urgent message that Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party Chairman Lawrence Guyot was trying to get across to him: Lily-white Democratic Party officials were preparing to conduct the 1966 Democratic primaries in the South, and the National Committee must act immediately to insure Negro participation. Lawrence's Delphic reply to Guyot was, "If you've got the votes, you'll win the election."

When the Voting Rights Act was being considered, most members of the Congress believed that federal registrars would start moving into almost every county in Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana as soon as the President signed the act. Attorney General Katzenbach had told the House Judiciary Committee that any county which did not comply with the law would find itself playing host to federal registrars. Chairman John Macy of the Civil Service Commission assured the committee that, if necessary, even house-to-house registration would be used by the federal registrars. But the only Republican c

he Consensus Marchers . . . . Robert G. Sherrill

ıt many bodies packed into that ited an area steams with its own nordial message, and it may be only message that gets through President Lyndon Johnson from March on Washington for Peace Vietnam. Just how many march- were there, clotting the side- ks around the White House on vember 27, is a matter of take r choice. The Chicago Tribune's mate of 12,000 is, as might be ected, laughably low. Most news- ers went along with the police mate of 20,000 to 25,000. Many hands at protest marching were lined to agree with the 40,000 50,000 range given by Sanford tlieb, of SANE, coordinator of demonstration.

rom the standpoint of news- er coverage, it was probably the st unsuccessful demonstration of t size ever seen around Washing- . Some demonstrations are in- tionally mute; the March on shington was not. It was an old- hioned harangue. The picketers eated to the Sylvan Theatre on Washington Monument grounds the early afternoon and there nt the next two and a half hours ening to some pretty rousing eches. Two and a half hours of nplaints, entreaties, recommen- ions, slurs and exposé.

ust now I have checked the Sun- New York Times again to be e I hadn't overlooked something, so far as I can find that news- er has not one line of the eches. As a gazetteer of relative ia, the Times was extremely ıerous; it set aside a couple of es for gossip about the march when it came to the message delivered by Norman Thomas, Socialist Party's Presidential ıdidate emeritus; Dr. Benjamin ck, who has taught several mil- Americans how to rear chil- n; Mrs. Martin Luther King, wife the civil rights leader; Congress- n George Brown, Jr., of California; Carl Oglesby, president of the Students for a Democratic Society; Ronnie Dugger, editor of the Texas Observer and a leader of the Texas liberals who have given Johnson political fits for years; Dr. Edwin Dahlberg, former president of the National Council of Churches, and Prof. Joseph M. Duffy, Jr., of Notre Dame—when it came to these two hours of impassioned statement, there was nothing. Not a word.

The Washington Post deserves separate attention. One of the unhappy conversational topics among Washington liberals in the last several months has been the Post's new role as a sort of interoffice memo of the Johnson Establishment. The decline of the newspaper has been on the way for many years, but within the last year it has become precipitous.

Since the march was a hometown event, the Post might have been expected to treat it with special accuracy and fullness. On the contrary, its pre-march stories were filled with inaccuracies and serious misrepresentations. The day before the march, the paper stated in the lead paragraph of a front-page story, "Delegates to a convention on how to get peace in Vietnam convened in a church yesterday and quickly fell to scrapping over organization and their march against the Vietnam war set for Saturday. Meanwhile, Sanford Gottlieb, coordinator of the march. . . ."

The "convention" referred to by the Post was that of the National Coordinating Committee to End the War in Vietnam, a scatter-gun organization of a much more radical sort than that headed by Gottlieb, and it had absolutely no role, official or otherwise, in setting up the march. The NCCEWV convention was one thing, the march was another, and by confusing the two—as it did several times—the Post must have confused the public as to the purposes of the march. Most of the conventioners want to pull out of Vietnam now, unilaterally; and while that might be a good idea, it was not the idea being pushed by the marchers, which is to cease firing, cease bombing (something Johnson started), stop increasing the size of our expeditionary force (it was 16,000 when LBJ became President; it's now 160,000) and—while the soldiers hang around on stand-by—try to get the United Nations to straighten out the mess in Southeast Asia.

The Post thus encouraged what a great hunk of the public was already too eager to believe: that the parade was made up of extremists running in all directions. As for the paper's coverage of the speeches, that came to fifteen words—one and a half sentences—uttered by Norman Thomas.

Elsewhere the Post wrote: "Ironically, a U.S. Army bus from Ft. Myer stood by in the Park as a first-aid station." Why it was considered so ironic is not clear, since the marchers were not opposing the U.S. Army but protesting a foreign policy—a distinction which the Post was no more capable of making, apparently, than those zany bus-driving patriots in New York and New Jersey who, since they refused to transport marchers to Washington, may find out that Dean Rusk doesn't run the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Post, which advertises itself as "one of the ten best papers in the world," capped off this brassy journalistic performance with an editorial in Sunday's paper in which the editors wrote magisterially, "The right to be heard, fortunately, involves no requirement that the advice of the protesters be followed" —nor, it might have added, be printed.

Carl Oglesby, the gentlemanly revolutionary on the platform, swinging the march's thought into what Spock later admiringly called "new parameters," suggested that corporate liberalism, which is the kind that has activated this country's government since 1932 at least, mucks up everything with its fantasies of benevolence, in Vietnam as elsewhere. "They are fantasies," he said, "because we have lost that mysterious social desire that could make them real. We have become a nation of young, bright-eyed, hard-hearted, slim-waisted, bullet-headed make-out artists. A nation—may I say it?—of beardless liberals," who "can send 200,000 young men into Vietnam to kill and die in the most dubious of wars, but cannot get 100 voter registrars to go into Mississippi," who cut the War on Poverty budget while planning to spend $2 billion on that "Disneyland creation," the Lockheed and Boeing supersonic transport.

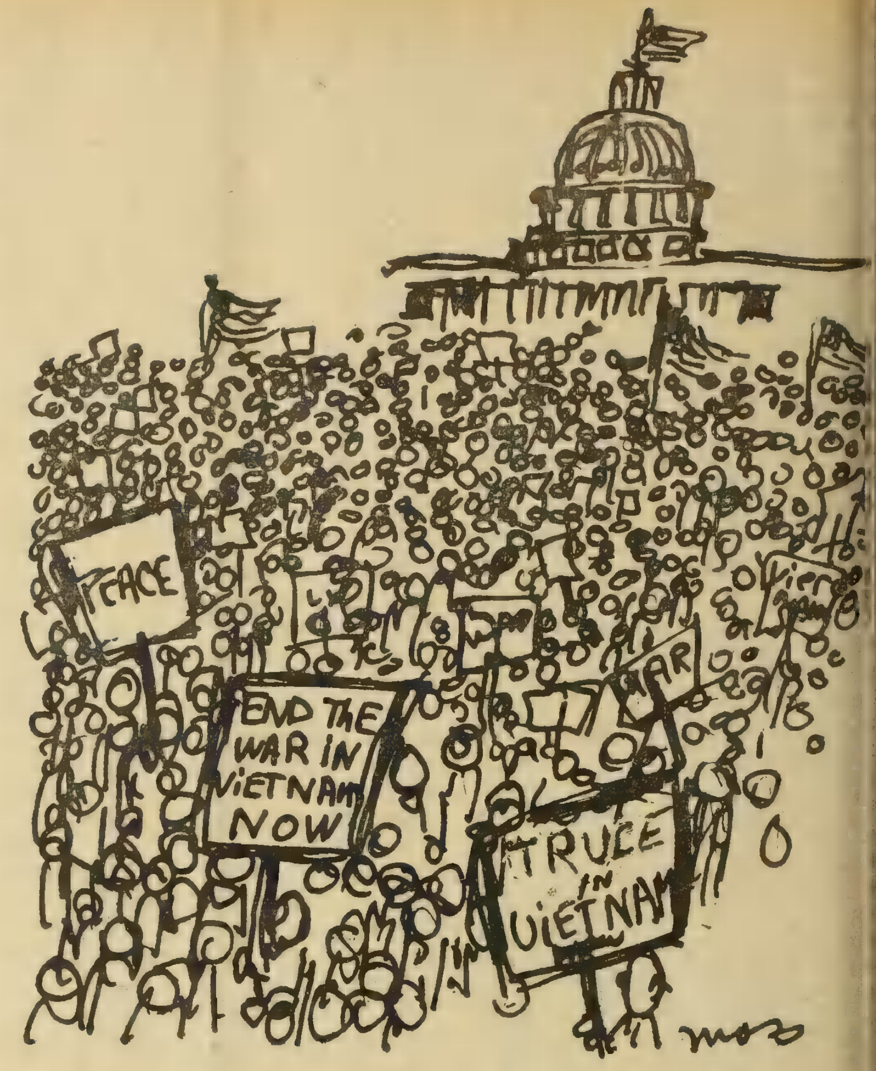
He recalled the 1953 coup in Iran, maneuvered by our CIA, whereby Mossadegh was replaced by General Zahedi, a World War II Nazi collaborator, who thereupon signed some generous leases with, among others, Gulf Oil Corporation. "The CIA's leader for this coup was Kermit Roosevelt. In 1960 Kermit Roosevelt became a vice president of Gulf."

He recalled the 1954 coup—supported by our CIA—in Guatemala. President Arbenz, who had wanted to nationalize a portion of the United Fruit Company's plantations, was deposed. "The following year General Walter Bedell Smith, director of the CIA when the Guatemala venture was being planned, joined the board of the United Fruit Co."

The Dominican Republic might have fared better in 1965, Oglesby further suggested, if our "neutral peacemakers" had been led by someone other than Ellsworth Bunker, Jr., ambassador to the Organization of American States, and "a board member and stock owner of the National Sugar Refining Company"; not to mention the fact that the President was being advised by Abe Fortas, "who has sat for the past nineteen years on the board of the Sucrest Company, which imports blackstrap molasses from the Dominican Republic," and "that rhetorician of corporate liberalism and the late President Kennedy's close friend, Adolf Berle, chairman of that same board." He reminded his listeners, also, that roving Ambassador Averell Harriman's brother Roland is on the National Sugar board

Oglesby did not mean that these are evil men, only that as corporate liberals they perform "for the corporate state a function quite like what the church once performed for the feudal state," seeking "to justify its burdens and protect it from change." Such men can never understand, much less appreciate, revolution.



The other speakers aimed more directly at the war in progress, with these points:

- Stop lying. "We are told Hanoi will not negotiate," said Dugger, for one, "but now we learn to our dismay that Hanoi offered to negotiate last fall, before we started the bombings and the troop build-up, and the Johnson Administration declined to meet with them. We learn from Adlai Stevenson through Eric Sevareid that U Thant offered to let us write out our own cease-fire terms and that he would announce them, and we would not do it."

- Stop saying that the enemy is adamantly stubborn until you have proved it through overtures. Addressing the President's ear from a distance of 1,500 miles, Norman Thomas insisted that "You have no right to say that such a call for peace and order will be rejected, that this will fail, until you have tried."

- Consider the permanent destruction of spirit from our efforts to establish a makeshift and p ably temporary puppet governm "A new and horrible way of lif developing in Vietnam," said D berg. "A guerrilla fighter who been in the war for five years, example, may marry a girl who herself been a guerrilla fighter five years. By the time their baby is five years old this l youngster, like its parents, wil laying mines and loading amm tion. It is nothing uncommon a Vietnamese soldier, north or so to take his wife and children r into the foxhole with him."

- How about a little magnar ity, for a change? "The grov emotionalism that comes with wars grips us and causes us to get . . . that our enemies m feel that their cause is also just noble," said Representative Brc adding with nice irony:

"It may be said that our posals are naive and unrealist the product of fuzzy thinking idealistic dreamers not charged hard responsibility of day-to- decisions. I can only say to you t the realists—the hard-nosed, ctical decision makers—have yet make a single correct decision prediction in Vietnam. And all resources of men and material this country are being poured o South Vietnam in a futile effort cover up their mistakes.

'I can offer a simple explanation these mistakes. The enemy we fighting—the illiterate, fanatic le peasants of Vietnam—have n successfully imbued by their mmunist leaders with a lot of zy, unrealistic, idealistic notions ich they are willing to die for otions like freedom from white onialism and a desire for de- cracy, self-determination and uality), and the government we supporting—the generals of igon—has failed completely, de- te all of our help, in instilling y of these fuzzy, unrealistic, ide- stic notions in the people they supposed to represent."

Stop paying so much attention the generals, those military think- whose breadth of vision is aptly ught in the remark by General rtis E. LeMay (and quoted at this ly): "My solution to the problem uld be to tell the Vietnamese nkly that they've got to draw in ir horns and stop their aggres- n, or we're going to bomb them ck into the Stone Age."

Efforts of the march leaders establish dialogue with the White use was even more futile than eir efforts to make their points in e press. Sitting in the Texas sun, esident Johnson attempted to con- al his irritation by issuing state- ents of his deep belief in free eech—scarcely a sensational posi- n, one might suppose, for the ghest constitutional officer in the astion of democracy," but many wspapers (whose editors are all o aware of Johnson's sensitivity to iticism) gave it top headlines. veral of the March on Washington eakers received it unbelievingly. best, they accepted it as a new sition. Dugger said it had been ntage McCarthyism when Attor- y General Nicholas Katzenbach, th Johnson's approval, announced ans for investigating the peace ovement for traitors. "Considering e President's well-known resent- ent of criticism of his policies, it difficult to avoid the belief that intended to put pressure against dissent by these announcements." Spock agreed. Up to this fall, he said, the peace movement was "treated with condescension but tolerated. Now we are being called unpatriotic" by the Administration.

The President's real attitude toward the marchers was revealed in his refusal to allow any of his immediate White House staff to meet with them. Gottlieb had thought that Lee White or Harry McPherson, two of Johnson's aides, would see them at the White House. I had discovered Friday through inquiries to Johnson's press office that this was not to come about. One official told me, "We are not taking notice of the march." Sure enough, the leaders wound up talking to Sherman Cooper, an aide to McGeorge Bundy, and they had to do it in the Executive Office Building next to the White House.

Cooper is a nice fellow, crushingly earnest, highly inarticulate, and so far removed from the policy level that talking with him is about like talking with, oh, say, Jack Valenti. The march leaders were treated to ninety minutes of nothing.

"It was like a ritual dance," Spock said. "He knew we had come there to propose certain things, and we knew he couldn't agree even if he wanted to. It was all so obviously futile. Cooper isn't Bundyesque; that is, he isn't terribly arrogant. There was just no use talking with him."

Gottlieb said that Cooper didn't think a cease-fire previous to negotiations would be prudent "because the whole thing could be jeopardized by a trigger-happy field lieutenant." Cooper recited his Administration catechism: that the war would be pursued in the future as it is in the present, that the demonstrators might have better luck with a cease-fire appeal to the Vietcong; and settled back for argument. He got plenty of it, and he handled it poorly. Repeatedly, when attempting to rebut something one of the leaders proposed, he would trip over a point he was trying to make and then, just as he began to untangle himself, one of the old tigers in the pack, like Norman Thomas, would start mawling his logic and the poor chap would be completely undone.

It is almost senseless to attempt to "feel out" the White House through some random remark of an aide to an aide, but Gottlieb did take feeble heart from Cooper's insistence that Johnson's position is still the one he enunciated on July 28. That was a speech in which he announced a step-up in military efforts, to be sure, but in which he also gave his first nod in the direction of reunification, by speaking of elections in the south or in the north and south. That was the hopeful part.

Actually, one concrete aspect of this march offers more hope than any random conversational droppings from poor Cooper. That was the respectable middle-class quality of the marchers, something The New York Times just couldn't get over. There were a few, very few, unwashed bongo drummers in the turn-out — certainly no more of that sort in the parade than were matched in the anti-parade crowd across the street in Lafayette Park, strutting around with "Burn the Teach-in Professor" signs. Perhaps a couple hundred on either side, canceling one another out, and leaving the field in command of 30,000 or 40,000 average, patriotic, disturbed Americans, such as Ed Bloch of New Jersey, who won a Purple Heart and a Bronze Star leading a Marine rifle platoon on Okinawa in World War II, or the Rev. David Gracie, pastor of St. Joseph's Episcopal Church in Detroit, who said, "If the only people on our side were far-out left wingers, I might begin to wonder if I hadn't overlooked something, that maybe I'm wrong. But when a man like John Knight agrees with our basic position, I take heart." Knight is one of the owners of the powerful Knight newspaper chain, whose editorial policies range from moderate to conservative.

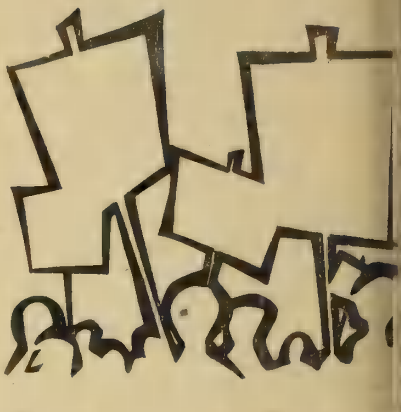
War veterans had been asked to gather in one place, and perhaps two companies of them—about 400 —marched past the applauding marchers. In their faces and clothes and faint memories of a military carriage they were indistinguishable from the American Legion rank and file on any Veterans' Day. There was some comfort in this resemblance.

Middle-class Americans may not be any wiser than beatniks—but they mean a lot more to Johnson, whose backbone of consensus is built right through the middle. These weren't civil rights protesters, revved up emotionally (there were, incidentally, few Negroes in the march). They were low-keyed bookkeepers and lawyers and housewives, many of them no doubt with a vote or two for Eisenhower on their record, but enough disturbed about a witless war that they would travel from as far as Pullman, Wash., to let their President know how they felt. When Johnson learns that the march was made of consensus types, it just might make a difference.

Many of the marchers and march leaders indicated that, being a part of the "middle Left," they considered themselves no more radical than President Johnson sometimes is. "We must remember," said Mrs. King, "that as late as 1957 a strong Senate Majority Leader stated unequivocally, 'I will not commit the precious lives of American boys to protect a dying white colonialism in Southeast Asia.' That strong Senate leader is now an uncertain President."

Herein lies a second hope: that Johnson—remembering his habit of reversing the field—will be smart enough to go along with the march leaders' judgment of themselves as middle Left, whether or not he privately considers them more than that, and to prevent his hirelings, like Katzenbach, from smearing them as subversive. Only by protecting their reputations can he save the area they occupy for a possible retreat of his own.

In any event, there was the sh mass. A nice turnout. "A little l erage," as Spock called it, "to ke the Administration doubtful."



Treason of the Experts . . . . Eric Bentle

Last spring, the president of a leading American university said that teachers should think twice before giving students advice in areas where they have no special expertise. How many times should university presidents think before giving teachers advice in areas where they have no more expertise than their faculty? And what is all this about "expertise" anyway? When is expertise ever required of people except when they are already judged to be wrongheaded? Are professors who support highly patriotic wars asked to have expertise in warfare or even in patriotism? Are they not —so far as their presidents are concerned—merely praised for their high sense of duty? Similarly, students who protest against a war are asked to have expertise, while those who support it are allowed to be ignoramuses — undoubtedly their ignorance is a big help. Similarly, too, McGeorge Bundy and his friends try to disqualify criticism on the plea that their critics don't have access to essential information: if we all had access to the data Mr. Bundy has access to, we would all reach his conclusions. Since we don't, we must trust him.

We are hearing a lot about trust these days. And the man we are above all to trust is Lyndon Johnson. Which is too bad, as he is not an unusually trustworthy person. I voted for him at the last election because I considered that he had virtues not shared by his opponent. An unusual degree of trustworthiness was not, however, one of these. People used to ask of Richard Nixon: would you buy a used car from this man? Well, which of us wouldn't prefer buying a used car from Barry Goldwater to buying one from Lyndon Johnson? The very quality for which Johnson is most admired — political dexterity — carries with it the defect of trickiness. He strikes me also as a man lacking in all conviction. That seems to be the source of his strength: he is without prejudice. He could at one time talk and act like a segregationist, but he really didn't mean it: he doesn't really mean anything. He is like a lawyer: totally willing to take his client's side, and give his all to it, with every outward sign of sincerity and felt fervor. When his client is the public, this makes him a very democratic figure, and when his client is only part of the public, he will show great skill in (a) wooing other parts; and (b) pretending that he has already wooed and won all parts. However, from time to time, the unforeseen happens, and someone actually speaks against Johnson or even acts against him. It doesn't seem right, but it happens. And right now in the United States that is the one fly in the political ointment. Everything is under co trol. All would be well. We wou have the best of both worlds— the comfortable advantage of pea and welfare added to the heroic flatus of a just war—if it were n for this impudent indocility, this tive . . . mistrust. Even the Bib though warning us not to put c trust in princes, says nothi against Presidents.

Trust the President. Trust M Bundy. Both Mr. Bundys. Also M Rusk. And until recently there w the supremely trustworthy Ad Stevenson. Yet Adlai Stevenson w caught lying in the UN when he d nied that the United States had a thing to do with the Bay of Pigs vasion. We have all lied in our tim but maybe not in such a big w Besides we don't all ask everyone take us on trust. Crises that he believed Mr. Ken-

rthy pastors and masters attackhich brings military campaigning

g; and one again had the impression that the two were quite close in the summer of 1964 when, in his turn, Johnson wanted to seem Strong. The question at the time was whether Goldwater could make Johnson seem an Appeaser. Just at that moment, the American Navy was attacked by the Vietnamese. At least that was what we were told, and considering where the Navy was, it didn't seem too improbable. Johnson's ideals soared sky-high (i.e., the order was given to drop bombs), and whatever Vietnamese got killed can today rejoice in Heaven or elsewhere that . . . Johnson was elected.

Since being elected, Johnson's main point about the Vietnamese has been that he keeps asking them all to negotiate but they won't. Another provable if patriotic lie is involved. Hanoi is now known, even in the United States, to have also offered to negotiate. Arthur Miller brought this up recently, and a Johnsonian magazine that reported the matter tried to refute Miller with the observation that the terms offered by Hanoi were unacceptable. So: “refusal to negotiate” means “refusal to agree to our terms.” Besides which there might be something to say of the tactic of bombing an antagonist, ostensibly as a way of forcing him to negotiate, but actually as a way of forcing your terms on him. Only to a public relations man is that any different from plain old war. But we are ruled by public relations men. Which is another reason why, much as we may admire the flexibility of the gentlemen, we cannot reasonably be asked to give them our trust. (Hardly had I finished writing this paragraph than Look came out with the Eric Sevareid article on Stevenson, and James Reston published his comment on President Johnson's “candor” concerning yet another offer to negotiate on the part of Hanoi. Further comment would be superfluous.)

A corollary of that university president's remarks would seem to be that professors who are experts do have the right to hand out advice. One question would be: expert in what? History? Geography? Political theory, and communism in particular? Southeast Asia, and Vietnam in particular? Then again, aren't experts purchasable? Can't anyone have the experts he can afford? And can't anyone hire experts to defend any position he likes to take? Above all, will not the entrenched positions, in the nature of things, be well defended? Won't Soviet experts on capitalism be experts against capitalism? And isn't just the converse true of American experts on this subject? Even if I am wrong here, do the experts ever agree on anything? And, if they don't, which ones should we be guided by? Are there experts on choosing-among-experts and, if so, do these experts agree?

A moment's thought about such difficulties can only cause us to wonder why there is so much talk of expertise all of a sudden. Isn't the main commitment of democracy, for better or for worse, to the nonexpert, i.e., people at large? For America, the country with the strongest populist tradition in the world, it is certainly strange doctrine that we should all be dissuaded from independent thinking and individualistic action.

The argument behind the “patriotic” line of college presidents and other Establishment figures is this: America is not a Communist country and therefore we need not believe Communist experts; it is an anti-Communist country, and therefore we should follow the advice of the anti-Communist experts. One can respect this logic to the extent of admitting that, in a war, there are only two sides and thus, if one took a side, but not Johnson's side, in the Vietnam war, one would be fighting against the Army of the United States and alongside many Communists. But then, unless one is a Communist, one is not taking a side, not advocating fighting for Hanoi, but a cessation of fighting by all parties. President Johnson has been urging recently that the Vietnam demonstrations are against the national interest. Of course, they are against the national interest if his policy is in the national interest, but that is precisely the question. Anti-war talk is always against the interest of a government at war: does that mean that anti-war talk is to be permitted only when there is no war to be anti? That such talk brings comfort to “the enemy” may well be true. In a given case, the enemy may deserve comfort, and, in any case, such talk has to be heard, surely, before it can be assessed.

Still, it will be urged, simply not volunteering in North Vietnam's army is not enough to detach one from the Communists. All the party would demand of a United States citizen would be anti-war propaganda, and this all who oppose the Vietnam action are providing. Aren't Communists strange bedfellows, especially for the young, anti-war liberals of our college communities? The answer to this is: Certainly, but to eschew strange bedfellows would be to eschew politics itself—which is, of course, what many of the old want many of the young to do. Since political conflicts, like wars, tend to have only two sides, a willingness to make alliances with the lesser foe against the greater is of the essence of politics. Naturally, there is often a question which is the lesser foe. Some people would be happier if Roosevelt had joined with Hitler against Stalin. That he did the opposite, however, gives our present-day pacifists an august precedent for their strange sleeping around. It is, of course, a matter of beggars can't be choosers. Against an imminent and total threat you accept any help available, and leave the question of your indebtedness to be answered later, if it can be: otherwise there may be no "you" to answer it.

I am not one of those who are blithe and unskeptical about "working with the Communists." "Whoever sleeps in their camp wakes up one morning to find himself robbed"—this is a quotation from myself, and a statement I do not repudiate. It was based on considerable personal experience. Many of the Communists I knew are still "there," and many of the practices I deplored are still current. At the same time, it would be ridiculous to assume that communism has not changed in the past ten years. Yet this is, in general, what is assumed in Washington and in American embassies round the world. And it is not just a matter of communism's maybe not being as bad as they think, but of its being a good deal different from what they think and indeed of its not being just one thing any more, as they assume it to be. We have grown used to laughing at the Communist use of the word capitalism, because for us the one word cannot sum up the multifarious ways of business. But our own men now use the word communism in just such a manner. If communism were indeed One and Indivisible, Russia and China would have combined to keep America out of Vietnam—or have joined America in destroying civilization. Johnson, Rusk and company would not have been able to show us what great moralists they are, except for a division in the ranks of communism which Washington has hardly begun to understand!

I have just spent a year behind the iron curtain as a "lackey of capitalism" (i.e., paid by the Ford Foundation), and meeting American officials here and there, charming fellows, for the most part, have gained the impression that they have no idea what a Communist, today, is like, nor yet what it is like to be a citizen of a Communist country. Some have not studied communism in any form. Others have studied it as if in preparation to be secret agents; others as if the only aim were to get an A in anti-communism. Now I would be the first to recognize that one might learn theology from an atheist, but I also think a theology student should at some point get to know what theologians are like.

One of the assumptions of the American official class is that living under communism is a fate worse than death. A corollary dogma is that everyone else thinks so too except for a hard core of Communists and fellow travelers. Whatever truth these two dogmas had in Stalin's day, they have both become provably false. It is not that everyone you meet behind the iron curtain likes his government, but the spirit of the Hungarian revolt of 1956 is no longer widespread, partly because it is now known that no help is forthcoming from the West, partly because life in Hungary—and many other places—is now a good deal pleasanter. Also, though it is a shock for the few Americans who bother to find out, many Easterners think that, while the East is bad, the West is worse. And Vietnam is cited as a vivid example. "What the Russians did in Budapest was outrageous; what the Americans are doing in Vietnam is more outrageous—first, because Vietnam is not on their frontiers and, second, because this is an endlessly continued and calculated outrage, not just a single mad lunge." This is not a quotation from one Easterner but from hundreds. Since anti-Communist zeal is seen as driving Americans into actions characteristic of

AH'M READY TO BEGIN UNCONDITIONAL PEACE DISCUSSIONS WITH ANY GOVERNMENT---OUTTA MA WAY BOY---AT ANY PLACE, AT ANY TIME.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

But I am not a pacifist. That the problems of international relations will get solved by the peace movement as we know it seems to me even more unlikely than that they will get solved through the "normal channels" of government negotiation. And on Vietnam I support that eminent nonpacifist Charles de Gaulle in advocating, first, a cease-fire and then a neutralization of South Vietnam. Is even de Gaulle considered a fellow traveler these days? Or an appeaser? He is considered an "impossible" fellow, but isn't that chiefly because he has let down the team, and made it hard for them to represent a more reasonable position on Vietnam as appeasement and fellow traveling? Let de Gaulle's motives be what they may, it is certainly true that he represents millions of people in the world today who, while firmly rejecting communism, reject American intervention just as firmly. Does anyone really believe that Harold Wilson is any more enthusiastic about the American role in Vietnam than de Gaulle? He is only much more easily overawed by superior power.

But this is another discussion. Here I am concerned with the peace movement, which is united only in its opposition to American policy in Vietnam, and not in affirmation of any remedy. Even from a nonpacifist viewpoint, however, the present peace movement may serve a good purpose. It takes all sorts to make—or remake—a world. It may even be that it is best for the intellectual to represent something other than the viewpoint that is, or even is going to be, dominant, and that one should ask of him how much he modifies the existing state of things, rather than what he would do if he were in power. However this may be, it seems likely that what most menaces the world today is neither communism nor imperialism as such, but the possession of so much power by so few men, be they "Communists" in Moscow or Peking, or "imperialists" in Washington, especially since the official view of each side is that it has a monopoly of civic virtue.

In this situation, the critical act, the intellectual's act, can have historic importance—whether it be Yevtushenko criticizing Soviet anti-Semitism or Robert Lowell refusing an invitation from Lyndon Johnson. In such ways is the claim to a monopoly of virtue challenged. Which in turn means that the regime concerned will be that much less ready to act in the name of virtue. Such protests are against "the national interest" not only in encouraging the enemy abroad but also—which the authorities are naturally not so apt to mention—in discouraging the trigger-happy friends of power at home. For the world's danger is what the Strangelove movie said it was. Not literally, of course. It was quite beside the point for the experts to refute Terry Southern, et al., by solemn proof that the bomb cannot be exploded by a single "kook" in the War Department. The point was, rather, that our whole world is, in all too real a sense, crazy; anything is possible, and the worst really can happen.

In this situation the classic function of the intellectual—to be the voice of reason amid the clamor of the world's irrationality—attains a peculiar urgency. The intellectuals can hope, must hope, to discourage the generals and the politicians from blowing the world up in one of their fits of patriotic (or proletarian) virtue. Discouragement is of the essence, and it was good to note that Lowell had discouraged even the ebullient Texan who is our Commander in Chief.

Intellectuals of the world unite! In a degree, they have already done just that. Living behind the iron curtain, I was surprised by the extent to which the intelligentsia there has the same gripes—and hopes—as ourselves. And they have to fight off the same facile accusation of disloyalty with the same entirely sincere answer: no, they don't wish to "defect" to the "other side," they wish to remake their side or, if that is not immediately practical, to restrain it from practicing what it preaches, to prevent it from having the courage of its professed convictions, to discourage it.

Discouragement, deflation—this is the negative side. There is much negative work to do, and the talents of an intelligentsia, from a Terry Southern to a Dwight Macdonald, may be specially apt for this work. But the intention, naturally, is positive, and there is a corresponding body of positive labor before us. It is the work of conciliation. Here the pioneers have been Martin Luther King and Pope John XXIII. Whether or not one can envisage the world acting on the lines laid down "Pacem in Terris," one can sur believe that the spirit the encycli embodies might influence the wor If one cannot believe this, on view of politics is wholly cynic Not to give politics up in that w is to bear witness to a degree faith in human possibility. But th faith intellectuals must posse if only to justify their own existen as the carriers of intellect.

So when I am asked if I thi our students are entitled to prote I must not limit my answer to patronizing yes, but must go on congratulate the younger gener tion on boldly bearing witness at time when so many of their elde were pussyfooting around discus ing whether witness should borne. This is not to say that forms of protest are proper—or ev shrewd. Some are obviously idioti some feeble; some morally ambig ous; some morally wrong. But th discontent itself is more than jus fied; it is necessary. For aside fro its political effects, it is helping an age of phony virtue and re murder, to keep alive both the bo and the spirit.

Jeane Dixon

PSYCHIC STAR OF THE YEAR . . . Daniel Cohe

One of the hottest current items in bookstores is A Gift of Prophecy, subtitled: "The phenomenal Jeane Dixon who publicly foretold President Kennedy's assassination and other world shaking events. These and many fascinating new predictions are documented here."

This collection of stories about the prophetic Mrs. Dixon has been stuck together with marshmallow prose by Ruth Montgomery, a syndicated Washington columnist who has for years printed a list of Jeane Dixon's New Year's predictions. The book has spent months high on the bestseller list (general, not fiction), and was the major feature of a recent issue of Reader's Digest. Millions have already read it; millions more will when the inevitable paperback editions and newspaper serials appear.

Jeane Dixon's public predictions fall into four categories:

1. Statements so obvious and general that they can't possibly be wrong. It takes no gift to predict, as Mrs. Dixon has for the past few years, that we will have racial troubles, trouble with China and trouble with de Gaulle.

2. Statements that lend themselves to a host of interpretations. Mrs. Dixon's prediction that in 1963 education would be a fashionable topic of conversation has been interpreted by her biographer to be a prediction of the school integration crisis in that year.

3. Some prophecies that are dead wrong. Mrs. Dixon foretold that the United States would go to war with China in 1958 over Quemoy and Matsu and that Walter Reuther would actively seek the Presidency in 1964. In these cases she says that she was shown the correct symbols but misinterpreted them. Other times, she simply doesn't a mit that she was wrong. She st maintains that Castro hired L Harvey Oswald to assassinate Ke nedy, and that two Russian cosm nauts, a man and a woman, we killed in an attempted moon lan ing.

4. Lucky guesses. After makin statements for many years, and Mr Dixon has been issuing predictio for more than a quarter of a centur a prophet is bound to have a co lection of a few startling hits.

But even here Mrs. Dixon far poorly. Her much-publicized war ing of Kennedy's assassinatio turns out on closer examination be a great deal less than awe-i spiring. A 1956 article in Parac magazine reported that she pr dicted that a blue-eyed Democrat President elected in 1960 would d in office. That is the only publ forecast of Kennedy's death that sh made. In fact, she predicted in 196 at Nixon would win. When he dn't, she hedged by saying that ixon was the rightful winner but at the Democrats had stolen the ection. In her annual New Year's edictions for 1963 she said nothg about an assassination. Hower, Miss Montgomery finds some gnificance in this statement: "The ar will see a beginning of the ecline in influence of many Ivy eague colleges, and non-Ivy League lleges will come into greater ominence and importance." Says iss Montgomery: "The man who ecame President that November as a graduate of Southwest Texas tate Teacher's College, and as a exas drawl began to replace the oston twang in the White House xecutive wing, the Ivy League umni lost their predominance."

The latest prophetic coup claimed y Mrs. Dixon is that she predicted
e great Northeast power failure.
his claim has been picked up by olumnists and radio commentars and provides a good example f how Jeane Dixon gets her repu-
tion. What A Gift of Prophecy ctually says is that she had a vision hat a Russian satellite passed over he United States and that as it did o all the lights went out. She interreted this to mean that the Soviets ave some sort of secret weapon hat can immobilize our communiation and lighting systems.

According to A Gift of Prophecy, eane Dixon has made many still nore specific (and accurate) prelictions, but these have mainly een in private sessions with per-onal friends. It is recorded that he has given remarkable glimpses f the future to well-known public igures: FDR, Churchill, Senator efauver, Speaker Sam Rayburn nd Carol Lombard. Unfortunately, ll of these famous people are dead, nd well beyond confirming or deying the accounts.

Much of A Gift of Prophecy is taken up with telling the reader what a wonderful, generous, loving and religious woman Jeane Dixon is. How, despite the fact that she is supposed to have told President Roosevelt not to "pamper" the colored people, and that she sees the present civil rights movement as, "the Negroes being pushed by an underground force — shoved upwards before they were ready . . . being used by others for selfish ends," it is nevertheless true that "when Jeane speaks of the colored race, she does so with love in her heart."

When you scrape off all the girlish gush, what is left is a picture of the wife of a Washington real estate dealer with a simplistic conservative outlook, who likes to speculate about world affairs as well as about the personal lives of her friends. The only thing phenomenal about Jeane Dixon is the amount of attention she has been able to attract.

Life, always alert to the latest national enthusiasm, ran a sympathetic profile on her in October. Although the magazine did not endorse her prophecies, it took no pains to point out their obvious flaws, and Mrs. Dixon sent Life a warm letter of thanks. Even the normally hardheaded Wall Street Journal has jumped on the Dixon bandwagon. In a major front-page article of November 17, staff reporter William D. Hartley wrote: "Mrs. Dixon has made some predictions which proved false, but on the whole she has been accurate to an uncanny degree."

Jeane Dixon's enormous popularity comes from two sources. First, those who share her view of the Negro revolution will want to believe the implication that the whole thing is a plot. After the 1964 election, right wingers comforted one another with the slogan, "27 million Americans can't be wrong," and according to Mrs. Dixon they weren't. One of her predictions is that Goldwater and his principles will be vindicated.

But political sympathy is only part of the story. The real wellspring of Jeane Dixon's success is that she exploits a deep mass hunger for a glimpse into the future. Practically the first thing man scratched on clay tablets when he learned to write were texts on hepatoscopy (divination by examination of the liver of a sacrificial animal) and extispicy (divination by examination of all the entrails). This is a bit messy and the practice has largely been abandoned in modern times, but that other ancient Mesopotamian development, astrology, is still very much with us, as shown by the clutter of astrological magazines and astrology columns in newspapers.

Jeane Dixon, too, dabbles in astrology which she says was taught to her by a Jesuit. Her most important prophecy contains a healthy portion of astrology. On February 5, 1962, she had a vision indicating that a child had been born, somewhere in the Middle East, who will revolutionize religion and bring all mankind together under a new Christianity. February 5, 1962, was the date of a rare conjunction of five planets, and astrologers the world over had been predicting earth-shaking events for that occasion. Some even forecast the end of the world. It turned out to be an ordinary day but Mrs. Dixon's prediction saves the astrologers' faces, since this revolutionary religious change will not take place until the end of the century — the year 2000 — also a significant date in the calculations of numerologists.

Early Christians tried in vain to put an end to all forms of prophecy that smacked of pagan beliefs. Instead, they added a new and terrible element—the Day of Judgment. To the early Christian the end of the world was not an event of the vague future, but something to be expected momentarily. Both numerology and some passages in the Book of Revelation seemed to indicate that the year 1000 was to be the last, and a panic swept Europe. The world did not end but neither did the superstition; end-of-the-world scares crop up regularly to the present day.

William Miller, the prophet founder of the Seventh-Day Adventists, discovered in the Books of Revelation and Daniel that the world would end on October 22, 1844. Such a definite prediction is always dangerous, and on October 23, 1844, many of the 50,000 faithful who had gathered on hilltops to await the Second Coming began denouncing Miller as a fraud. But the sect survived the survival of the world and today the Seventh-Day Adventist Church has some 300,000 members. Jehovah's Witnesses, the fastest growing religious denomination in America, is an offshoot of Adventism. For them the slogan, "Millions now living shall never die," is not symbolic.

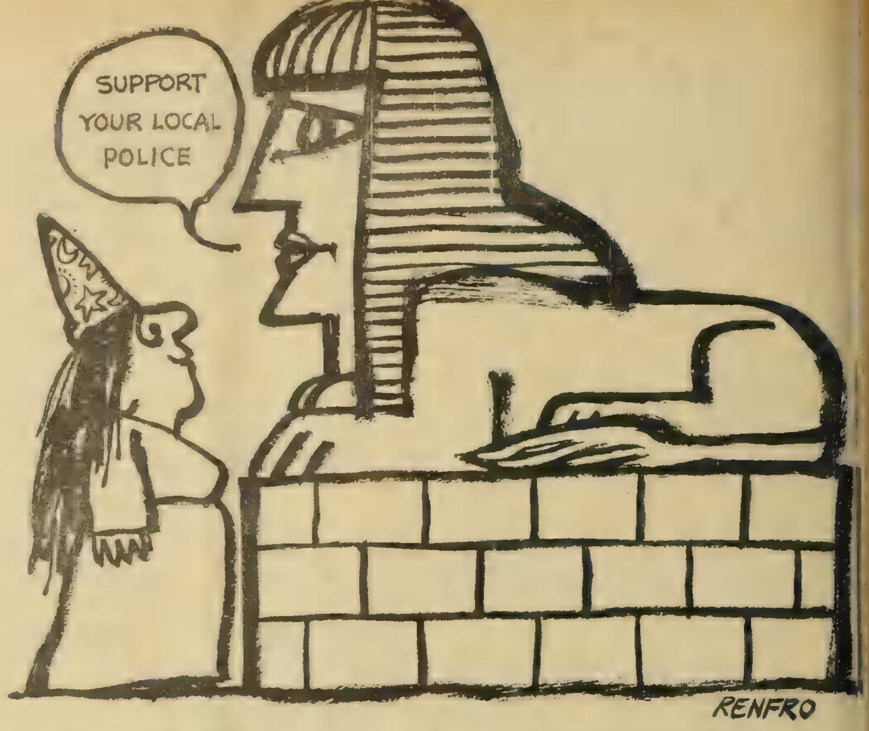
Prophecies of imminent Armageddon are the basic prop for evangelistic preachers from Billy Graham on down. They are rarely as specific as William Miller, but they vividly picture the world as being in its last days. The signs and portents harkening the end are no longer the comets, earthquakes and plagues of Medieval times, but communism, crime and the legal sale of Fanny Hill.

In what I take to be a different twist to the world prophecy, Jeane Dixon sees 1980 as the year of the great war with China that will devastate mankind. But by 2000 the survivors will be united in a new universal religion.

Necromancy, conjuring up the dead to give a glimpse of the future, began in ancient times, and continues up through today's mediums and table-tapping seances. Mrs. Dixon does not neglect this side of the mystic arts. While watching President Kennedy's funeral she had the grotesque, but obscurely significant, vision of the dead President dancing an Irish jig on top of his coffin.

Dream interpretation is yet another time-honored method of divination. Freud pretty well killed the prophetic dream for the sophisticated, but the Old Gypsy Dream Book and Egyptian Dream Book still sell in Harlem and other areas where the ever-hopeful policy player tries to find the key to riches in his sleep. The eclectic Mrs. Dixon has prophetic dreams. Her most revealing took place on the night of July 14, 1952, when she dreamed that a snake had invaded her bed and was wrapped around her legs and hips. Somehow this meant that the future wisdom was to come from the East, but Freudians might find a different interpretation.

Despite an occasional burning at the stake, prophets emerged from the Middle Ages as a respectable and powerful group. By the 16th century they were regularly consulted by popes and kings. The greatest prophet of the time was Michel de Nostre-Dame or Nostradamus, who became the Rasputin of Catherine de Medici of France. Today there is still a surprisingly large audience for his fuzzy, mystical quatrains which have been used to explain everything from the rise of Napoleon to World War II. A Manhattan bookseller, who claims to be a reincarnation of Nostradamus, generates a good deal of personal publicity with his annual list of predictions.



By the middle of the 19th century, however, the whole prophecy business had suffered a crushing loss of status. Whereas seers had once been persons of education and influence (the great astronomer Kepler was better known in his own day as an astrologer), prophecy was relegated to despised outsiders like Gypsies. Their methods were the crudest: Palmistry, crystal gazing, reading cards and tea leaves. It looked like the end of the 5,000-year history of prophecy, and in 1898 the French encyclopedia Nouveau Larousse Illustré could write with some confidence: "astrology has hardly any adherents other than swindlers who play on public credulity and even these are fast disappearing." The encyclopedists proved no better than the prophets at charting the future, for the 20th century has witnessed a major revival.

It is from the debased era of 19th-century prophecy that Jeane Dixon draws most of her inspiration. When she was 8 years old a Gypsy fortuneteller looked at her palms and said: "This little girl is going to be very famous. She will be able to foresee world-wide changes, because she is blessed with the gift of prophecy. Never have I seen such palm lines!" The Gypsy gave her a crystal ball and her career began.

Sophisticates who might be amus by Jeane Dixon prefer the "scie tific" study of prophecy and oth henomena that come under the eading of extrasensory perception r ESP. Today the capital of this esearch is the laboratories of Dr. . B. Rhine in Durham, N. C.

For more than forty years, Dr. hine has tried to apply some semlance of the scientific method to he study of prophecy (or precogition as he calls it), telepathy (beng aware of the thoughts of anther person) and clairvoyance seeing an event without physically eing there). All these abilities, in is opinion, are part of a single ncompassing ability—extrasensory erception.

Rhine's basic test is to have subects call the order of a deck of ards. Over the years he and his ssociates have conducted tens of housands of tests under varying onditions. The results have not een very impressive, and the methds have been severely criticized by rthodox scientists who point out that all the non-chance results could easily be due to simple errors in the construction of the tests or the recording of the results.

Yet because Rhine has worked so long and hard, and since many of his published works are as dull as the average scientific paper, many people have gotten the impression that he has found a natural, physical explanation for ESP. Rhine has never made such a claim. On the contrary, he believes that ESP "liberates [the] sciences from the confinement of a materialist metaphysics." To Rhine all such phenomena are spiritual.

Rhine has offered to test those who claim to have ESP abilities, but few professional mediums or fortunetellers have ever entered his laboratory. Says Rhine: "For the most part, I think they are probably afraid the tests would be too severe for them."

Jeane Dixon is the psychic star of the moment, but she is not the only big-time psychic operating today. A few years ago the papers were full of stories about Peter Hurkos, a Dutchman who claimed that a fall on the head had awakened within him the powers of "psychometry . . . divination of facts concerning an object or its owner through contact with or proximity to an object."

With characteristic bravado, Hurkos wrote in his autobiography, Psychic, "I am not always right. I have never claimed more than eighty-seven and one-half per cent accuracy in my readings, the percentage established by scientists after performing thousands and thousands of tests with me. With that small margin of error, however, I can tell what has happened to people I meet, or to people at a distance, what is happening and what will happen to them in the future." But there were no scientists—only self-styled "psychical researchers"; and no tests—only performances.

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, Hurkos made a great reputation as a crime solver. In every major unsolved crime of the period there was a rumor that the police had secretly sought Hurkos' aid. Often a fan would put up Hurkos' fee and with a great deal of publicity he would utter some vague statement. But this method can be pursued only so long, Hurkos was too much in the spotlight, and he was publicly wrong too often. There were mutterings of false arrest suits, and the police, who had always been wary, became downright hostile. Even his devoted admirers became suspicious.

In 1963, Jeane Dixon was discussing Hurkos with Dr. Regis Riesenman, a psychiatrist who dabbles in psychical research. Dr. Riesenman had once brought Hurkos to Washington to solve a grisly child murder, and he is one of the main supporters of Mrs. Dixon. She told Dr Riesenman that Hurkos was headed for trouble. It was a safe prediction. A few months later Hurkos was arrested for impersonating an FBI agent and for carrying an arsenal of guns. He was later freed, and is today still around, doing what amounts to a vaudeville show on the spiritualist convention circuit.

His place has been usurped by another Dutch crime-solving psychic, Gerard Croiset. Croiset's methods are similar to Hurkos', but he is more careful and polished. Moreover, he stays in Holland most of the time and predictions at a distance are less likely to boomerang on the prophet. A biography of Croiset by Jack Harrison Pollack is receiving wide circulation in paperback. Croiset, who has wild hair and hypnotic eyes, possesses an advantage over the very plain Mrs. Dixon in that he looks like a prophet. Still, in the little world of parapsychology all is not going smoothly for Gerard Croiset. His arrogance has irritated Miss Eileen Garret, the 70-year-old former medium who now heads the influential Parapsychology Foundation and who is recognized as the grand dame of ESP.

Behind the stars are a host of lesser prophets, from the storefront Gypsy fortuneteller to people like Chaplain H. Monroe Howard of the Foundation for Universal Truth in Los Angeles, who will answer sealed questions by mail for the nominal fee of $2. There is also a bewildering and constantly shifting array of organizations ranging from the Parapsychology Foundation to the Association for Research and Enlightenment, Inc. The fall conference of the association featured a speech by Mrs. Dixon along with such other attractions as a discussion of Atlantis.

All modern prophets, no matter what their methods, claim in common that they want only to help people and that they have a direct pipe line to God, usually the orthodox Christian God. Mrs. Dixon never hesitates to point out that she is a devout Roman Catholic. She claims to have had her famous vision of Kennedy's death during her morning meditation in St. Matthew's Cathedral. No one today admits, as did the early English seeress Mother Shipton, that he has sold his soul to the devil for the gift of prophecy.

The persistence of the belief in second sight defies all logic and experience. No prophet has ever become rich at the track or in the stock market, although some have made a nice living off those who did want to become rich through those media. The most famous of all stories of prophecy should warn the potential believer as to the nature of the phenomena he is putting his faith (and often his money) into. It is the story of Croesus of Lydia and the Oracle of Delphi. Croesus asked the oracle if he should attack the Persian Empire. The oracle replied that if Croesus did so a great empire would fall. Croesus thereupon attacked, was defeated and lost his empire. He sent a furious message to Delphi, complaining that the oracle had lied to him. The answer, which sounds like the punch line to a poor joke, was: "You didn't ask which empire."

Roland Barthes

Roland Barthes holds the chair of sociology at the Collège de France; his major work, the Sociologie du Vêtement, is soon to be published in France. He has also written On Racine, a brilliant example of his style and peculiar vision, which was published here by Hill & Wang, The occasion for the piece below was, evidently, one of those picture-stories of writers on vacation which Le Figaro, like The New York Times, has made an annual event.—Editor

Gide read Bossuet on his way down the Congo. This posture nicely epitomizes the ideal of our writers "on vacation," as photographed in Le Figaro: it combines with commonplace leisure the prestige of a vocation nothing can obstruct or degrade. What a scoop—so effective sociologically, so frankly informative about the image of its writers our bourgeoisie prefers.

What apparently astounds and delights this bourgeoisie most is its own broad-mindedness in admitting that writers, too, are people who take vacations. The vacation is a recent social fact, one whose mythological development is worth recapitulating. Initially an academic phenomenon, it has become a proletarian, or at least an industrial one. To assert that this phenomenon can henceforth concern writers, that specialists in the human heart are also subject to the canons of contemporary labor, is a way of convincing our bourgeois readers that they are indeed abreast of the times: we pride ourselves on recognizing the necessity of certain commonplaces, we condone these "modern" realities.

Of course this proletarianization of the writer is acknowledged with reluctance, and then only to be destroyed all the more thoroughly afterward. No sooner is he endowed with a social attribute (and a vacation is a highly agreeable one), than the man of letters quickly returns to the empyrean he shares with the professionals of his vocation. And the "naturalness" in which our novelists are presented articulates a sublime contradiction: that of a banal circumstance produced by a materialistic age as against the glamorous status bourgeois society readily grants its intellectuals (providing they leave it unharmed).

Proof of the writer's marvelous singularity is that on this famous vacation, which he fraternally shares with foremen and shopkeepers, he never stops writing, or at least never stops producing. A pseudo-worker, he is also a pseudo-vacationer. He writes his memoirs, corrects his proofs, prepares his next book. And when he does nothing at all he admits the fact as a truly paradoxical sort of behavior, an avant-garde exploit only a powerful mind could afford to divulge. We know from this last piece of bravado that it is only "natural" for the writer to write all the time, in any situation. First of all, this converts literary production to a kind of involuntary (hence taboo) secretion, since it escapes human determinisms: to put it more nobly, the writer is the victim of an interior god who gives tongue at all times, without a moment's concern (the tyrant!) for his medium's vacation. Writers may take vacations, but their Muse labors on, and the childbed is endless.

The second advantage of such logorrhea is that by its imperative character it naturally passes for the very essence of the writer. The latter may admit to a human existence, an old house in the country, a pair of shorts, a baby daughter, etc. . . but unlike other workers, who change their essence and, once on the beach, become nothing but summer vacationers, the writer retains his nature as a writer everywhere; send him on vacation and he parades this sign of his humanity; but the god abides—one is a writer as Louis XIV was a king, even on the chaise percée. Hence the function of the man of letters is to human labor a little what ambrosia is to bread: a miraculous, eternal substance which condescends to a social form in order to be more clearly apprehended in its fascinating difference. All this leads to the same notion of the writer as superman, a kind of differential being whom society parades in order to play up the factitious singularity it concedes him.

The homely image of "the writer on vacation" is nothing but one of those cunning hoaxes society perpetrates to enthrall its writers mor thoroughly: nothing exhibits the singularity of a "vocation" better than t be contradicted—but not denied, fa from it!—by the banality of its inca nation: it is an old trick in all hagio raphies. Hence we find this notio of a "literary vacation" spreading fa and wide—way beyond the summer the techniques of contemporary jou nalism are increasingly employed t make the writer an everyday spectacl But it would be a mistake to interpre this as an attempt at demystificatio Quite the contrary. No doubt I find thrilling, even flattering, simple reac er as I am, to participate by this intimacy in the daily life of a rac Chosen by the Spirit; no doubt I fe deliciously "in" with humanity whe the newspapers tell me this great po wears blue pajamas and that youn novelist prefers "blondes, Camember and heather honey." Nevertheless, th other half of the bargain is that th writer becomes a little more of star, withdraws a little farther fro this earth to a celestial habitat whe his pajamas and his cheese never inhibit his resumption of a noble an demiurgic discourse.

Publicly to supply the write with a carnal body, to reveal that h enjoys dry martinis and steak tartar makes the products of his art eve more miraculous, of an even mor divine essence. The details of his dail life, far from clarifying the nature o his inspiration, merely permit th writer to emphasize, by such conf dences, the mythical singularity of hi special condition.

For only superhumanity can accoun for the existence of a being tremendous enough to wear blue pajamas a the very moment that he reveals himself as a universal conscience, or better still prefers Camembert in th same voice with which he announce his forthcoming Phenomenology o the Ego. The spectacular conjunction of such nobility and suc futility signifies that we still believ in the contradiction (a totally miraculous one, each of its terms is miraculous too); it would obviously lose al its interest in a world where the writer's task is secularized to the point o seeming as natural as his sumptuar or gustatory functions.

Madison Avenue Medicine Man

T PLAY IN THE FIELDS OF THE LORD. By Peter Matthiessen. Random House. 373 pp. $5.95.

J. Mitchell Morse

eter Matthiessen is not a serious nov- ist, only an earnest one. He has hought long and earnestly about the ltimate human question: Who am ?, and about the penultimate and an- epenultimate questions we encoun- er on the way to it: Who is my neigh- or? Where is your brother? Why did ou do it? Why did I do it? What must I do? But in order to think ser- ously about such questions we must ave language; and that is what Mat- hiessen lacks. A writer, as writer, hinks in words or not at all; and Mat- hiessen's command of them is lim- ted.

He is evidently aware of the tech- niques by which the best modern novelists derive order, meaning, life, rom the chaotic flux and welter of unuttered consciousness and the life- ess conventionality of our most habit- ual utterance; but he rarely tries to use them, and that is just as well, for when he does try, his clumsy lan- guage fails him; most of the time, hoping for the best, he continues in he old ways and does poorly some- hing that nobody does well now be- cause good writers are no longer in- erested in doing it. The difference between good writing and bad is not a matter of opinion or taste; literary judgment is not analogous to a preference for one kind of ice cream rather than another. The quality of a piece of writing is objectively demonstrable. It is first if perhaps not last a matter of language; and in this respect the standards for the novel are now so high that few novelists meet them. In our time the novel at its best has become a form of poetry—Comment c'est, for example, is a poem whose formal perfection and lyric intensity, sustained line by line throughout its length, are one; and if few novelists have anything in any way approaching Beckett's skill, it does not follow that we must be satisfied with inferior work. Moreover, the general level of our competence in language, both as writers and as readers, has fallen so low that there is now a total difference, a difference not only of quality but even of kind, between a few excellent writers and all the rest, and between a relatively tiny group of readers and all the rest.

The unhealthiness of the division can hardly be exaggerated; for in many intelligent people, whose nonliterary intelligence is misrepresented as mere earnestness by their artless fiction, it leads to an unconscious or a half-conscious despair and cynicism with regard to their work and their readers. I think Mr. Matthiessen is one of these. He obviously intended to write a serious novel, but I think he has unconsciously condescended to cheapness.

At Play in the Fields of the Lord is a switch on a missionary phrase, "at work in the fields of the Lord." It is perpetrated by Lewis Moon, a half-breed Cheyenne, who gradually turns out to be the principal character. It sums up his chosen role, his chosen self: a self we see only briefly, in the last chapter and in a short scene preceding Chapter I. Thus the novel circles awkwardly around and doesn't quite succeed in catching its coda.

What happens then between the prebeginning and the end is chiefly melodramatic action, persona-type talk, and exotic nature notes. It happens in and near a Brazilian jungle town. It involves the relations among two fundamentalist missionary families from Moody Bible College, a Catholic missionary from Spain, the local commandant, two soldiers of fortune from the United States, and a tribe of untamed jungle Indians. The tribe is represented by a wise chief and his stupid successor, and by a medicine man whose intuitions are those of Madison Avenue.

The government wants to develop the jungle lands to the east, and therefore the commandant has been ordered to "pacify" the untamed Niaruna Indians who live there. The law forbids him to attack them except in self-defense; however, if a foreign plane on its way elsewhere should bomb and machine-gun the native villages. . . . This is where the soldiers of fortune come in. They own a plane marked "Wolfie & Moon, Inc. Small Wars & Demolition." The commandant is holding the plane, its gas tanks empty, until they pay their back rent in the village hotel, which he owns. He puts the proposition to them in the bluntly subtle manner of the musical-comedy greaser he is; they accept reluctantly, what with their hearts of gold and all. The missionaries are naturally worried about what is going to happen to their prospective clients; the ineffective second fundamentalist tries to dissuade Wolfie & Moon; his chief and the Catholic missionary are silent.

Wolfie is a standard-model beat picaro, Jewish variety; Moon is supposed to be more complicated. In a state of permanent nauseous revulsion against the racism of whites and the various ways in which Indians adapt themselves to it, he is looking for some untamed Indians.

Moon as pilot, Wolfie as bombardier, go out to pacify the Niarunas; but Wolfie is unaccountably inept in getting at the bombs; and Moon, subject to no such self-deception, deliberately makes it as difficult as possible for him. An Indian comes into the clearing from which all the others have fled and shoots an arrow at the

THE DECADENCE OF JUDAISM IN OUR TIME

By Moshe Menuhin

Destined To Be Praised And Damned But Not Forgotten

"Dear and courageous Truth-teller Menuhin! Your nobly written book has received more than one reading from more than one person. . . . There have been repeated sessions of enjoyment, some of which you may well guess have been by way of renewing memories of old friends who have left the scene, as Albert Einstein, Judah Magnes and Martin Buber, men of great courage, clarity of mind and firmness of determination to bring Jew and Arab into some sort of cooperative harmony."

(Professor William Ernest Hocking, Alford Professor Emeritus, Harvard University)

"It is a fearless and noble book, the type one cannot put down. . . . I congratulate you on this enormous amount of research, diligence and careful thought. . . ."

(Dr. Dan Gillis, Department of Classics, The University of Texas)

"I find Menuhin's book fascinating reading. . . . If the leaders of American Jewry would read Menuhin's book, it would not only increase their knowledge of the facts, but it might also give them courage to throw off the shackles of a philosophy and program which ghettoizes us intellectually and emotionally now, but which may destroy the hard won victory of emancipation and force us to return to the ghetto in actuality."

(Rabbi Morris Lazaron in "ISSUES," Summer, 1965)

"This Jewish author . . . has brought together considerable evidence revealing the undesirable effects of a chauvinistic kind of ('Jewish') nationalism upon the Jewish community as a whole, and sees them as contributing to the decadence of true Judaism. . . . Anyone reading Menuhin's book carefully cannot lay it aside with a shrug of the shoulders. It opens too many vistas and avenues of thought."

(Dr. Erich W. Bethmann in "VIEWPOINTS" of October, 1965)

"THE DECADENCE OF JUDAISM IN OUR TIME is a forceful report and provides insight into the Zionist mentality. . . . The author presents detailed and damaging evidence. . . . He is affronted by what he regards as jingoism, and indicts the 'military junta of Israel'."

(Edward Wakin in THE SATURDAY REVIEW of June 19, 1965)

"Moshe Menuhin's qualifications for recording his 'spiritual adventures' are remarkable, and one could say, unique. . . . This book is an undisguised, full scale frontal attack with no holds barred on political Zionism. . . . No reader of this book can doubt that the author is in deadly earnest. We can perhaps at least be grateful to him for having included statements which rarely appear in books by Zionists."

(Samuel Landman in THE LONDON JEWISH CHRONICLE of September 24, 1965)

"THE DECADENCE OF JUDAISM IN OUR TIME is a magnificent accomplishment. It is a rare compound of astuteness in observation, compassion in feeling, clarity of writing, and courage of conviction. . . . Menuhin denounces Zionism as being contrary to Judeo-Christian ethics, and a distortion of the Jewish religious faith. He charges Zionism with erecting walls between Jews and non-Jews in every community and in every country. . . . The book, in my opinion, is a MUST for Jews . . . for Arabs . . . and it belongs in the hands of all Americans of all religious faiths. . . ."

(Sami Hadawi in THE ARAB WORLD of July, 1965)

"Moshe Menuhin has set down his credo as American and Jew, and he doesn't mind telling us he is proud of being both. What distresses him, however, is to find so much Jewish energy in this country being deflected into alien channels by an 'anachronistic' Zionism which places a narrow nationalism above spiritual Judaism."

(M. Geltman in THE NATIONAL REVIEW, October 19, 1965)

"The book you have just written is one the world long needed, but only someone of your caliber and standing could do so successfully. I am sure that it will lighten the dark corners of the minds of many."

There we have it: the prissy im personal "one," the Holiday magazin
"allure," Kipling's "the ends of th earth" and the adolescents' "close t the gut," all in the same sentence
Who is this Moon? I don't think th idiomatic chaos of the sentence i intended to reflect the chaos of hi soul. I think Matthiessen just doesn write well. Throughout the book w keep bumping into clumsy sentence such as these: "It had been the con frontation with the padre, he decide that had set in motion that series c grotesque events," and "Moon ha

on its side on the flat limb of a lo boggling at metaphors like these

"His eyes were bald with fright," "Th sinews of his limbs coiled on th bone," and "Heat. The lunatic rin ing of cicadas, like rusty gears of a old universe."

I don't mean that the writing is a bad. Now and then there is a vivi image, such as this: "He crouched i the stern, shrunk up like a wet spider or this, of an Indian who has ju een shot: "Aore sprawled sideways n the first clumsiness of his life." There are also some very good psychological observations, such as this, which is good despite the clumsiness of the sentences that carry it: "But Yoyo did not answer, not out of recalcitrance but because he spoke no English; instead he smiled enthusiastically. Though of neither an enthusiastic nor a smiling turn of mind, he had learned early in the game that gringos—and especially the evangélicos—responded favorably to eagerness of any kind." But good as the observation is, that last sentence is not one would willingly read again. Nor is the first. Compare their lurching, stumbling awkwardness with the elegance of the first two sentences in Beckett's Murphy: "The sun shone, having no alternative, on the nothing new. Murphy sat out of it, as though he were free, in a mew in West Brompton." Murphy is a more interesting character than Moon because Beckett's prose is better than Matthiessen's. Even the corny dramatic encounters are ultimately due to the cheap language in which Matthiessen thinks. It would be ridiculous to ask whether Moon is Adam or Cain or both, because Matthiessen's prose makes him nothing but a lot of sloppy sentences. In fiction, a failure of technique is a failure of insight.

Trilogy of Discontent

N THE WORLD. By George P. Elliott. Viking Press. 442 pp. $6.95.

Bernard S. Oldsey

George P. Elliott's third novel, In the World, seems to be a 19th-century book about 20th-century America. One of the characters in it says to another, "Now read me the next chapter from Bleak House"; and this gentle hint, placed near the conclusion, is enough to remind us that the American scene we've been viewing for some 400 pages is indeed bleak; but it also underscores the fact that we've been reading a book whose loosely arranged elements need a Dickensian knot to hold them together, finally, with some kind of hope.

If it's Dickens at the end, it's Tolstoy from the beginning. In the World might very well have begun with, or at least used as epigraph, the famous opening to Anna Karenina: "All happy families are alike; every unhappy family is unhappy in its own way." Elliott circulates widening cracks of dissolution around the home life of the book's protagonist, Alfred Royce. Although Royce is a philosopher of the law who teaches at Berkeley, a much admired man being considered for a federal judgeship, he is pre-eminently the paterfamilias whose role is almost shattered in our crumbling society. All elements of the novel radiate outward from him and his family—his wife, Beth, who threatens their marriage by zanily jamming their San Jacinto house with inherited furniture; and his three daughters, Lizzie, Sybil and Nancy, who, as intellectualized versions of nubile giddiness, offer themselves up as case studies of modern American mating customs.

In the World is full of discursive ideas and subplots. Among other things, it contains the assassination of two industrialists by a declared anarchist and his partner in crime, a ruined idealist (who after World War II can find no great cause for which to fight and makes this his last quixotic gesture). It uses as leitmotifs the rejection of legalistic power for the sake of the university teaching, the acceptance of crooked TV quiz money as a slide away from moral rectitude, the rejection of property for life among the Pueblo Indians. It poses most of the large, resonant questions of our time—on race relations, labor and management, property, justice, science and religion. But all of these eventually lose ground to the basic domestic issue, as though Elliott grew weary of them, or as though he felt that they were ultimately dependent upon what happens within the home.

We come to understand why some of the questions are jettisoned as we listen to Royce explain a new idea he's got to his friend Horace Skellings, another lawyer who has worked with him on the Labor Relations Board. Royce contends there is nothing left to fight for in respect to social justice. Labor and Management are no longer enemies; they're partners. The labor movement no longer moves; it simply asks for Buicks instead of Fords. Civil Rights is more of the same: the Negro is now assured of his rightful place in American society; but he will get it for the wrong reason—our government's attempt to prove itself before the rest of the world. The Negro will then be integrated into the same bad dream of mass culture. Royce is looking for something more than the material plenty implied by this kind of social justice. He stares off past science in the humanistic regret of lost transcendence. He himself has come, as his Negro son-in-law puts it, "as close as man can get to being wise without God's aid." Perhaps the central and unanswered question of this book is whether this is wise enough.

At least Alfred is wise enough to solve his own domestic problem; and above all the novel turns out to be an analysis of our mating, unmating, and re-mating customs. It should be the marriage counselors' delight. Cases in point: (1) Alfred and Beth (who has had Lizzie by a previous husband) separate and then reunite in the Dickensian finish which comes as a dramatic echo of Auden's line, quoted early in the book, "We must love one another or die." (2) Lizzie marries Joe Thompson, a Negro who passes for white, and their marriage breaks on the rocks of religion and money--Joe seeking sanctuary in the cathedrals of Europe; Lizzie in the lay version of a nunnery, living among the Koyola Indians, uncontaminated by the concept of private wealth. (3) Robin Farquhar, pregnant by Leon Kalish (Royce's star pupil and disciple), marries Hugh Hansson, a fairy godfather type, whose will to procreate is as sterile as the glass dwelling in which he and Robin pose as the ideal young marrieds for the Institute of Modern Living. (4) Kalish marries Frenchwoman Chantal Bigonneau to keep her and her son from being deported. Chantal, who had her son by a cousin, now a priest, was originally married to a man who wanted to protect her and the boy; after the death of her husband, she was brought to the United States by Harry Evans, one of the two men convicted of assassination mentioned earlier. Kalish and Chantal intend to get divorced as soon as her citizenship is assured, and he hopes to marry Sybil, the Royces' second daughter. (5) Sybil, however, decides to marry Jim Sorb, brother of the first husband of Kay Ravagli. (6) Kay marries Woody Ravagli when her first husband is killed in the war and Woody's first wife dies of polio. (7) Horace Skellings, an aging playboy, has married five (six?) times; and during the Royces' separation he offers his present wife, Virginia, as a consolation to his friend Alfred. (8, 9, 10, etc.).

Somewhere in Crockett, Mont., Hugh Hansson's father has been divorced and remarried. In Bakersfield, California, Robin Farquhar's oft-loved mother lives estranged from her latest husband—he in the last trailer of the camp they own and run jointly, she in the first. And in New York City, Stan Wriggle and Penny Hardwick, TV quiz manipulators, are divorced from each other but going steady together.

(Such a summary of a novel tends to sound parodistic: at one time the meanest criticism of a Faulkner book was simply a summary of its contents. To some extent Elliott deserves this kind of treatment and this summary was done with the intent of near parody, with, however, the implication that Elliott himself faced the problem of handling a series of American lives containing elements of self-parody.)

One has the feeling that the novel might better have begun around page 192, or at least have been compressed somehow in its entirety, since the overall design of the work is strategically good: from the opening party thrown by the Royces we trace out the patterns of the family and their friends who are present at the party. But the lines in between are often sketchy and mixed, and the style shifts from humdrum to good and back again.

In any survey of the newest groups of American novelists—the so-called "black humorists" (like Hawkes, Heller, Barth), the practitioners of the saintly picaresque (like Bellow, Salinger, Kesey), and the neat utilizers of the mythic overlay (Buechner, Updike, Malamud)—Elliott looks out of place by at least three generations. But this is not to say all is lost. Isn't there still a place and a need for the novel that includes elements of life not caught up in the newspapers and magazines? A novel that does not give up certain living materials to the writers of social science treatises? In the World is such a novel. If it lacks the sustained literary impact of Elliott's early and fine short story "Among the Dangs," it has some excellent things in it—especially the set pieces like those in which we visit Robin's mother's place, or the death scenes in Justice Durkeim's house. It is Durkeim by the way, who establishes the central symbol of life's depth and mystery with a spiral pattern that he work into his rock garden—a pattern tha strongly contrasts with the glass hous of false domestic bliss set up by th Institute of Modern Living in the a rium of the former Mardon Tow House.

The peculiar quality of In the Worl is that, once read, it does not leav you easily. Lacking in clean effect an concentrated force, it has substanc and provides numerous shocks of recognition. What can be said finally i that it takes its place—with Elliott' first two novels, Parktilden Village an David Knudsen—in what might b considered an almost anthropologica trilogy of discontent with American society. The author seems to be tellin us that this is a society which ma not be simply in transition but decay In either case, he memorializes th events.

Exemplary & Other Baldwins

GOING TO MEET THE MAN. By James Baldwin. The Dial Press. 249 pp. $4.95.

David Littlejohn

There are a number of James Baldwins, who write with varying degrees of honesty, relevance, humility, precision and style. All of them are here: the autobiographizing lyrist, the tautstrung neurotic, the truth teller of the early essays, the celebrity bully. But the shrill and ugly voices, for our purposes, the inflated and fraudulent selves can be as useful as the eloquent and the honest. For James Baldwin is not just another stylish bestseller, not just the latest and most advertised "Negro" writer; least of all is he only a by-product of and publicist for the Civil Rights episode. He is becoming, if he has not already become, our Exemplary Man. One of his distressing liabilities, I grant, is that he knows this, knows it too well, that he wears his robes heavily and with swagger. Nevertheless, to understand him may well be, in many and difficult ways, to understand ourselves, and these stories will help.

Going To Meet the Man should no be read first or alone, since many o its effects depend on interreflection back and forth with the earlier works Some stories borrow the voice and setting of Go Tell It on the Mountain others the jagged, brittle tones, th Manhattan underground world o Another Country. Many echo the essays too, once strong ideas with muc of their savor gone. And there ar tastes as well of the whining, bullying rant of The Fire Next Time, th flip self-importance of the Mailer essay or Nothing Personal. But all of i counts, even the dispiritingly bac Much of the excitement of readin this collection, in fact, comes from reader's constant, hovering balance between reassurance and despair, reassurance at what is so right, despai at what is so wrong. It is one of th most full-blooded, alive and anxiou books of the year.

Of the weak, or perverse, or eve merely dispensable stories—four ou of eight, which is probably not bad– two are appendices to Go Tell It on th Mountain of 1952, with the same bo hero, the same family and setting roughly the same manner and tone "The Rock Pile" is a tiny étude, austere and slightly touching; "The Ou

ing"—again young John and his family, on a church picnic up the Hudson River—is much more ardently and vigorously bad. It bears the idea of a good story, the skeleton of it: the cracking of adolescent tensions within the setting of a Negro Ship of Fools. It even includes a rich, rocking 8-page tour de force of a Negro shipboard service. But we have come a long way down from Go Tell It on the Mountain. There, the passional catharsis, the harrowing of emotions, filial, sexual, religious, were worked through, suffered for, honestly earned and attained. Here they are only tiredly told, unconvincingly claimed and remembered.

But there are worse. "Previous Condition" and "This Morning, This Evening, So Soon"—the latter his New Yorker story, his anthology story—represent the worst of the several James Baldwins, the pretentious, near-paranoiac, picked-on Negro, ostentatiously bearing all the sufferings of his race. They recall the worst excesses of The Fire Next Time. In both cases, a clue is the total lack of detachment between the author and his heroes, his sniveling, chip-on-the-shoulder narrator heroes. This suffering, self-pitying voice is a sign of James Baldwin's least controlled and least valuable fiction.

It is not easy to be a Negro, a writer, a celebrity and a homosexual in America, and sometimes the strain will show; it is not even easy to be a thinker in America, and this is part of the lesson of Baldwin's weaker work. But at his best, he can move terror and tears, he can do things that need to be done better than anyone else.

"Sonny's Blues" hovers delicately in tone between Go Tell It on the Mountain and Another Country: it is a small, artless, ambling story, one weak man's memory of his brother. It is the account of his long attempt to understand his brother Sonny, a junkie turned jazz pianist in Harlem, so quietly and uncertainly told that it is almost not a story at all, but just the telling, the trying; a confession that drifts coolly and unhurriedly through digression and reminiscences.

"Come Out of the Wilderness," at the opposite extreme, is a dazzling display of Baldwin's style at its sharpest. Its prose surface has a bristly, electric exactness, its dialogue the bright newness of good talk. Nor is this style mere bravura display; it sparks into life an analysis of mixed emotions, a dramatization of the undercurrents of social intercourse that is diabolically keen. The story, an open and unprejudiced playing through of the Odi et amo tensions of an affair, seems a dis-

Poverty in America

Introduction by Michael Harrington

"Nearly all articles in the volume are first rate: startling in content, moving in eloquence, and challenging in new approaches suggested. The editors have cut across specialty lines and included social workers, politicians, economists, labor leaders, sociologists, journalists, and the poor themselves to get a variety of points of view. Yet with all the variety they have unified the whole, and the book can be read from beginning to end not only with profit but with whatever satisfaction substitutes for pleasure when such a poignant condition is the subject."—Los Angeles Times

Sappho: Poems and Fragments

Translated, with an Introduction, by Guy Davenport

Sappho sang of Eros and Aphrodite, of graceful youths with bronzed bodies and flowing hair. She sang of trees and flowers and love in an age of gold. In Guy Davenport's unique translations the elegance and supple grace of Sappho's lyrics are re-created for the modern reader.

"...there is real distinction in the writing and a refreshing freedom from the self-conscious tone, vacillating between pretentiousness and archness, which spoils most attempts to do Sappho."

—Richmond Lattimore

"Sharp, bright, above all essentially strange, these versions convince us for the first time in English that Sappho's voice comes from a world piercingly unlike our own, but with so articulate an identity that we recognize it in the least fragment."—Hugh Kenner

Prisoner's Dilemma

This book explores the nature of conflict in the deceptively simple game from which the book takes its title. If two players cooperate, they both win; if they don't, they both lose. But they can cooperate only if each trusts the other, and the game is so structured that there is no rational basis for trusting. Moving beyond game theory, Prisoner's Dilemma builds a bridge between scientific psychology (based on hard data and reproducible experiments) and the psychology of complex inner motivations which create conflict and human strife.

tillate of all that is best in Another Country. It has the same crackling Manhattan setting, the same crouching-cat tension. It has something new and surprising to say about the races. In its Gallic manipulation of human paradoxes, it offers a cool, cruel analysis of the self-deluding stratagems of lovers, a microscopic plotting of our bitchy little hearts.

"The Man Child" is something entirely new for Baldwin, a highly charged lyrical, pastoral tragedy. Tightened, condensed, closed up, "fired" somehow, it would be as full and classic a piece of pain as a D. H. Lawrence story. Four people—a boy, his father, his father's friend, his mother—are frozen in a mythic isolation. Their story grows, the trap tightens, slowly and expansively, through incremental repetitions, incantatory rhythms, the loving simple cadences of a legend.

The title story, finally, deserves its pre-eminence: it is the most important story here. "Going To Meet the Man" is Baldwin's second attempt to imagine sympathetically the mind of a Southern white bigot. I found his picture to be credible, intense and almost hypnotically convincing. It is everything that his first attempt, Blues for Mister Charlie, was not.

From a surprising opening in his nuptial bed, we follow the nighttime reverie of a many-ways-frustrated Southern deputy sheriff, a TV newsreel figure come to life. Reflections on his brutal day among the Negroes lead him back, through the device of a remembered song, to where it all began: the pace, the simple river-run structuring are flawless. In a scene worked with exact and almost unbearable crescendo, the reader watches (with the boy Jesse) his first lynch burning, every detail. And as his anticipation turns, with the boy's, to a strange kind of horrified fulfillment, he may find himself forced to admit that there is in this barbaric, anti-human rite a genuine primeval satisfaction. Lynchings do really happen, and one comes to understand why.

Crystallization of Craziness

THE MAN WHO HAD HIS HAIR CUT SHORT. By Johan Daisne. Translated from the Flemish by S. J. Sackett. Horizon Press. 224 pp. $4.95.

Richard Howard

When the language, and consequently the wisdom, of the mad came to be forgotten or ignored in modern Europe—when the king no longer had his fool, when the "Natural" was confined, the lunatic merely derided—it was literature's task to invent the perspective of unreason all over again. For it is always the function of literature to relocate the values displaced when a culture hardens into a civilization. Hence it was precisely when the mad were first shut away, when reason dropped out of the dialogue with unreason (as it had been pursued, say, in Rameau's Nephew) that literature began to propose lunacy directly—without the mediation of a form (as form had contained Lear) or of an opposing figure (as Sancho had corrected the Don). In 1836, Gogol wrote a short story called "The Diary of a Madman" and initiated a genre which was to become as determinative for modern fiction as the tale of supernatural obsession—"The Overcoat we all crawled out from under," Turgenev called it—proved to be for Russian letters in the 19th century. The titles alone suggest the lineage, and the necessity: Notes from Underground, Confessions of a Fool, Notes of a Madman, Diary of a Mad Old Man. . . .

The form has become normalized: in a hospital, a rest home or a prison, the madman who is invariably a criminal as well, at least in his own eyes, recounts his terrible deed, the crystallization of his craziness, committing to the language his experiences in the irrational, encouraged and often edited by his keepers. Three of the most admired successes of the day articulate this genre for us: Lolita, or the Confession of a White Widowed Male "edited by John Ray, Jr., Ph.D.", I'n Not Stiller, the notebooks of Anato Ludwig Stiller, "sculptor, husband lover . . . prisoner, with a Postscrip written by the Public Prosecutor"; an most recently The Tin Drum, which begins: "Granted, I am an inmate o a mental hospital; my keeper neve lets me out of his sight. . . ." Thes are masterpieces of a period which ha discovered — and by these superlativ novelists explored — the destructiv relations obtaining in the world toda between love, law and reason. Curiously, for all their world-wide successes each of these works has an emblematic, even a historical nationalism about it, an aura of the anthematic— America, Switzerland, the Polish Co ridor are often claimed (even by thei authors!) to be as much the subject as the settings of these narrative and surely there is a local twist o expression, intensified by insanit which the form urges to an apotheosis such works are always the product o high linguistic virtuosity, declared t be untranslatable, but eventually, we are lucky, translated.

We are lucky indeed in the case o The Man Who Had His Hair C Short, a novel written in 1948—an thus before the other three books have mentioned, though very muc after Gogol, whom the author clain as a precursor—by the world's greate Belgian author, one Johan Daisne. Th degree of our fortune may be calc lated by the distance the heart ten to sink upon looking up this author a handbook of world literatur "Pseud. Herman Thiery, born Ghe 1912. Flemish author. His writing markedly cerebral, with metaphysic tendencies." Plays, poems, novel stories, radio and television script literary and film criticism, travel boo and reportage — out of this welt an incomprehensible idiom (as we ive elsewhere plucked, or had pluck- for us, a Machado de Assis, a agerman, a Dazai), Mr. Sackett, the anslator, has come up with a notable hievement, working into English the utinous, slobbery texture of this ovel that has already been translated to French, German, Spanish and alian. It is a book worthy to stand ith Lolita, with I'm Not Stiller and ith The Tin Drum as a further in- ection of the genre of madness.

Its narrator and hero, Antfield, aracterizes himself as a man who as never been able to come to a full op ("Yes, everything considered," begins, "there has always been omething.' "), and as we must ex- ect from this form, the breathless lling persists, reflexive and relent- ss, for a single paragraph of over 200 ages. A failure as a schoolteacher e replaces his acquaintance, Coun- llor Brantinck, at the academy where meets his fatal passion, Fran, who about 17 when the book opens), as lawyer ("Once I had the stand to yself, I went to pieces spiritually, to speak"), as a husband, father nd citizen ("In God's name, don't ake up the automaton in yourself, at is the abominable but expensive sson that my afflicted life has let e teach others; the lesson for which, may be, I have had to live"), Ant- eld is certainly a howling success quite literally) as a lover, and in his reposterous confrontation with the bject of his desires "ten years later," e accommodates his murmurous, an- hological style to one of the most re- arkable revelations of life's quality nd character in modern literature. ike Lolita's epiphany, Fran's exposes he corruption of the innocent — the irl had been seduced by Brantinck, who let Antfield substitute for him- elf at the school in order to avoid candal—and the true simplicity of he "simple." The risk of the form, s Oskar's drumming has taught us, s that we have no idea whether the errible events it encompasses have ctually occurred or are merely in- ented by the madman who tells them; we are not certain, at the end, if Ant- ield has really murdered Fran or ven if she has ever existed—the am- iguity of our eventual decision is aisne's as well. In his inept preface, he translator seems to have no idea why the corpse upon which Antfield watches an autopsy being performed n the afternoon must turn out to be he body of his beloved's father as she describes the man's death to Antfield that same evening. . . . Yet only the articulate can be inarticulately expressed, only coincidence can be chaotic: like space, the plots of the insane are curved, and though nothing ever ends, everything comes together.

The quality of this novel, then, is circular: the mind trapped on its obsessive treadmill, the body immured in the maze of romantic love, the social animal committed to the rat race of class hierarchy. The reader must constantly correct his apprehension of events traced early in the book by what he learns later; every instance entails a revision of our understanding, an upheaval in our expectations. In the tale told by an idiot, there are no constants in experience—the virgin is a whore, the living body is a death —there are only climactic moments, ecstasies and abysses which in the very telling become interchangeable.

Antfield's life is expressed, by him, only in the terms of its affective moments—ten minutes on a platform, as he watches Fran receive her diploma from Brantinck, take him much longer to recount than the ten years before he sees the girl again, ten years that gently swirl down the drain of the petit bourgeois Disposall of private life that is as merciless in Belgium as anywhere else. The final encounter with Fran, resulting in a pair of hour-long monologues in a luxury hotel, with Antfield now a ruined, dusty clerk, and the virginal Fran a discredited café singer, wrings the novel to its highest pitch of hysteria, the note of a man who must compulsively rehearse his symptoms until their dramatic enactment releases him:

> I have wanted to be complete. Not unnecessarily complete, but as necessarily complete as possible. When everything is done, I must still have the strength to read it over and over, to think of the most suitable names possible for all those who are mentioned in this confession. I do not want my word to be considered untrustworthy any longer by the director, whom I have promised to let bygones be bygones. But it was stronger than I; I believe I have heard a higher command, to write down everything here first, before I do as the director wishes. I think that I must note all this down, so that a few should know how everything really happened.

We recognize the sound of that immediately—it is the circular, burrowing, comical, desperate, exemplary voice of our weakness, as we have heard it from Gogol to Nabokov; it is as if, to quote Auden's Memorial for the City, the entire genre were under the rubric "let our weakness speak":

This is the flesh we are but never would believe,
The flesh we die but it is death to pity;
This is Adam waiting for His City.

A word about the book's title: Antfield is obsessed with having his head clipped, shaved, shorn of any reminder of his animal self, the fleshly perpetuations of his physical being. His terror of the body of this death is literally presented in the autopsy scene, one of the most deliciously gruesome in all literature (ranking with the famous eels-and-horsehead setpiece in The Tin Drum), and emblematically pursued throughout the book, especially in the ablutionary ritual by which Antfield prepares for his final confrontation with Fran. But rigorously justified, on intellectual grounds, though every impulse of theme and structure may be discovered to be in this harrowing, hilarious book, there is further an immediate justice rendered to the physical world by Daisne's talent as a writer, a response to felt life for which I am even more grateful—a justice that rescues this author, immediately, from the dreadful categories of "cerebral" and "Flemish metaphysician" as arbitrated by the handbooks of literature, and restores him to the even more banal, but inevitable, categories of "central" and "accurate." His book is about the way we live now, whether we have long hair, short, or through no fault of our own, as we imagine, none at all.

With the death in Rome on November 25 of Angelica Balabanoff, First Secretary of the Third International, one of the last links with Russia's revolutionary leaders is gone. By the time I met her, her political career was all but over: she had dissociated herself from the Soviets in 1923 because she refused to compromise her vision of socialism. But there remained Angelica Balabanoff the woman—gracious, generous, spirited, highly intelligent, capable of strong moral indignation—and while her political influence evaporated, her vital personality did not.

My first interview with her—in 1942, when I was working for the German-language weekly Aufbau—started under rather unpromising circumstances, but over the years this contact developed into a close friendship. Mme. Balabanoff was then staying at the Park Plaza, near Central Park in the West 70s, a kind of Grand Hotel for impoverished literati. On its musty-genteel premises lived almost every writer of consequence from Central Europe, excepting Thomas Mann. Like its tenants, the hotel had seen better days. The elevator was frequently out of order and Mme. Balabanoff remarked to me once: "I sometimes stand there pushing the button, and nothing happens. After a while I forget what I came out for in the first place, and then I go away again. It happens to all of us here."

But on that first encounter I found Mme. Balabanoff nearly unapproachable. She kept saying, "Why don't you read my book?" (I had—My Life as a Rebel, published by Harper in 1938) and, "Any factory girl is more interesting than I am. Why don't you interview one of them?"

I then took her attitude as a rather calculated flirtation with her former eminence; later I discovered that she was genuinely modest. Still, for the purposes of an interview I was getting nowhere, so I told her point blank, "Madame, I am the working girl, and you are preventing me from doing my job."

That made perfect sense to her and broke the ice. "I did ask you to come up here," she conceded, "and now I might as well give you some tea."

It was the first of innumerable cups of tea together, sometimes spiked with rum. Wherever she went—and she traveled over most of the civilized world—Mme. Balabanoff never separated from her samovar. She prepared many good dinners, with piroshki and other Russian delicacies. I would sit and listen to her talk until late into the night, and I learned of her hates and loves.

Her hatred of communism and Communists amounted to an obsession. This tiny dark-eyed, mild-mannered woman would turn into a reg lar virago at the mere mention Stalin's name. "Lenin betrayed t Revolution," she cried, "and that t rible man Stalin is burying wha left of it. Promise me never to tru a Stalinist!"

To make absolutely sure she wasn mistakenly consorting with Comm nists, Mme. Balabanoff would ask n abruptly every time we met, "Are y a Communist?"

This was an extremely farfetch idea, but I always gave her the san answer—I was not, never had bee and never would be a Communist— until I finally convinced her. Aft that she started worrying about n husband. "I hear he is a Communis she said. I assured her that this w completely untrue and that, in fa the German Communists had prac cally guaranteed to hang him on they got hold of him.

"That's good," she said, leavi wide open exactly what was goo about it.

Despite her inveterate hatre Mme. Balabanoff never denounc foreigners suspected of Communi affiliations. She could have caused great deal of trouble, since her wo carried weight, but she would n stoop to any form of betrayal, not eve for a "good cause." Her single mo remarkable trait was her total inte rity, which is why she was bound fail in the game of power politics.

Our many talks took place in th pleasant atmosphere of her vario homes. She eventually moved to a apartment on West End Avenue, fourth-floor walk-up where she dra ged her groceries up the stairs, out breath, resting on every step. Sti she had enough energy left for ar cles and speaking engagements, ru ning errands for ailing friends, rai ing money for others when she he self didn't have a dime, and devoti herself to her favorites among émigr —the Italian Socialists.

Mme. Balabanoff was fluent in fi languages—Russian, German, Frenc English and Italian — and curious enough she spoke all of them, eve Russian, with a faint foreign acce Our meetings invariably ended in reading of her multilingual poem one of which was called "Tears." Th extraordinary woman, who had a companied Lenin to the Finland St tion, who had tried to change th world by her stubborn pursuit of pu socialism, permitted herself the on vanity of composing sentimental vers

I never had the heart to tell her at I didn't care greatly for her ems and disliked being read to. Be- les, no poem in world literature—cluding "Tears" — could stand up ıder so much recitation. Yet her easure in these harmless sound ef- cts was disarming and as impor- nt to her as her love of mankind.

From the beginning I sensed that e whole subject of Mussolini, whom e met when she was a student in itzerland in 1912, was taboo. Their timate friendship ended in an im- acable personal and political en- ity, and she could not even bring rself to mention his name. I was l the more surprised when, in the ring of 1945, she volunteered to tell e how she learned the most impor- nt news of her life.

Mme. Balabanoff was in the habit visiting a certain friend—"as an t of charity." This was a woman in r dotage, given to incoherent mut- rings. One afternoon the old lady as in her usual state of mental con- ısion, rambling. In Mme. Balaban- f's own words:

> She kept repeating the same vords over and over, "Mussolini is lead . . . Mussolini is dead . . . " n a dreadful monotone. I told her not to fret, I humored her, I tried to divert her, I turned off the radio, thinking the noise bothered her. That whole day my poor friend was going from bad to worse—hopelessly out of touch. Eventually I went home, but I had trouble getting into my apartment—I'd misplaced my key. I had to wake the super, and that took a while. By the time I was inside I was too exhausted to listen to the radio, as I usually do, and dropped into bed.
> At four in the morning the phone started ringing—it was the first reporter who asked for my comment on Mussolini's death. I was absolutely stunned. He told me, very nicely, I must be the only person in America who didn't know Mussolini had been killed, and wasn't it the height of irony?
> So here I was, with my crazy old friend who hadn't had a lucid moment in years, trying to tell me something I'd been waiting for all my adult life—the death of Mussolini.

Angelica Balabanoff, the last great liberal and humanist of her generation, outlived her worst enemy by twenty years. She went to live in Italy, a country she loved beyond all others. In one of her rare emotional moments she told me, "I would walk to Italy if only they would let me." She spent her last years in peace, in her chosen homeland.

THE DEVILS

MAN OF LA MANCHA
YOU CAN'T TAKE IT WITH YOU

n Act III of John Whiting's The evils, Grandier, the soon to be offi- ially tortured priest who is the play's entral figure, asks the Jailer to treat im with pity. "Look, this is your sys- m," the Jailer answers. "Just be ıankful that you can get men to do ıe job. Don't ask that they should e humane as well."

That is a pithy speech. Scattered ere and there in the text there are thers. But the play as a whole, emi- ently earnest and strenuously sin- ere, makes little dramatic sense. ased on Aldous Huxley's novel about he Vicar of St. Peter's Church in oudun (France) during the 17th cen- ıry, The Devils concerns lust and aith, politics and superstition, igno- ance, clerical cruelty and redemp- ion. The play is impassioned without eing articulate.

Grandier is a sophisticated man of od prodded by carnal desire. His learning, wit, pride and success with women arouses the venomous envy of the middle classes, the vindictive suspicion of the priesthood, the animosity of the crowd with the exception only of the lowly Sewerman and a devout bishop. Though depicted as a true son of the Church, Grandier may be called a premature Voltairian. He regards his sexual appetite as guilt in respect of his vocation but a gift of God in respect of his person, a curse and a blessing, possibly even a justification of faith. Because he is handsome and has a reputation for virility, his very name and a momentary sight of him inspire the Prioress of a nearby convent with an obsession about him.

With the connivance of the state authorities, which seek to destroy Grandier because of his opposition to their policies, fanatic hysteria is bred first in the Prioress, possessed both by her sexual urge and the wish to avenge herself on the man who has provoked it, and then in the other sisters of the convent. All the women are accused of being in Satan's clutches. The Prioress is physically desexed by the community priesthood, a ritual which is followed by the inquisitorial martyrdom of Grandier. Though he is innocent of any contact with the Prioress, he is guilty of both fornication and the abandonment of a woman he professed to love and whom he has made pregnant.

What is Whiting after in this maze of motives? The play purports to picture the plight of man. We are doomed by political pressures, by mass ignorance, the ugly repression of our natural impulses, the corruption and cruelty of ecclesiastic institutions. But in the end Whiting arrives at an affirmation of life expressed in the muddled mysticism of such speeches as "We live a little while, and in that while we sin. We go to Him as we can. All is forgiven"; to which the antiphonal response is "So there is meaning after all. I am a sinful man. And I can be accepted. It is not nothing, going to nothing. It is a human creature going to love."

nothing determined. Nothing, that is, beyond a smear of themes prayerfully mixed from political, psychoanalytic, existential and pseudoreligious sources, all of them concluding, due to a lack of artistic and intellectual coherence, in fervid banality. At a time and in a place where hardly anyone comprehends the drift and nature of our disarray this may easily be mistaken for profundity.

If the play is an indigestible mess, its production, directed by Michael Cacoyannis, is blasphemously bad. The essential requirement in such a piece is to create the feeling of an environment in which the possibility of the satanic presence in a human being is admitted as real. The production we see is as close to this as the Broadway theatre is to the Cathedral of Chartres. The spirit that obtains is the devotionalism of Shubert Alley. The result is "comedy." The audience patronizes the play's characters; it complacently mocks the credulity of past ages.

Several of the actors playing minor parts are as effective as they possibly can be in the circumstances. But Jason Robards' Grandier wears his cloth dispiritedly. Besides being miscast, he appears not only unconvinced but embarrassed by his role. Anne Bancroft of the beautiful eyes and expressive countenance seems driven to her wild outbursts by sheer actor's (or director's) will, rather than by inherent need. No wonder: she is surrounded by nothing but lumber.

After The Devils, to date the season's most elaborate offering of our serious theatre, one is almost eager to return to the frivolous. Skyscraper, a musical by Peter Stone, Sammy Cahn and James Van Heusen, is very agreeably animated by Michael Kidd's moujik energy, coupled as it is with the salt of local wit. We are also treated to some good showman gimmicks and jokes, and to the charm of Julie Harris' disarmingly innocent dedication to everything she does. I heard some people complain—oh the purists we have in our audiences!—that Skyscraper is not true to Elmer Rice's Dream Girl, the play on which it is based. As if that mattered.

The stage of the ANTA Washington Square Theatre (where the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center was once housed) is craftily used by Howard Bay's setting of Man of La Mancha, a new "Musical Play" by Dale Wasserman, Mitch Leigh and Joe Darion. The pattern of Cervantes' story of Don Quixote is so irreducibly touching that it works here as it does in almost every telling.

It is helped in this instance by Richard Kiley's appearance and by his commitment to the symbolic idealism of the part, as well as to its sure-fire stage pathos. In addition, there is a supporting cast of similarly committed actors, several of whom are endowed with unusual singing voices. More persuasive, perhaps, than any of these elements is the sentiment of enthusiastically old-fashioned "theatre" with which Albert Marre has informed the production. Though all this left me, case-hardened as I am by the season's rigors, indifferent for a while, it ended by my acknowledging to myself that the show was Sweet Corn—and thus not to be rejected.

I am glad that the APA Repertory Company under the aegis of the Phoenix Theatre has an unqualified success in its revival of Moss Hart and George Kaufman's You Can't Take It With You at the Lyceum. The APA has previously offered us revivals of such plays as Man and Superman, Right You Are, The Lower Depths, Scapin. It is an organization that merits support.

As to the play itself, everyone seems to remember (and rejoice in the memory of) its 1936 production in greater detail than I do. Though I probably laughed then along with the rest at its whacky pleasantries laid on and put together with the expertness typical of its famed team of authors, I may also have been little cool to it as a piece of facil evasion in the midst of the depression. While it may then have served as still another form of relief at time when all forms of relief were gratefully accepted, the play strike me today as much more "timely."

We are at present exactly nowhere I know, I know: there is war in Vietnam, there are protest marches and countermarches, there are Communist in China and mayhem in Mississippi etc. etc., but our New York theatre audiences are fixed in what strike me as an immovable spiritual statu quo in which wars and rumors of wa serve only as a hollow echo fitfull disturbing their prolonged sleep.

Thus You Can't Take It With You which tells us in glib good nature no to worry too much about making pack of money or about the nonsense o paying the income tax or working a jobs we don't care anything about, i essentially a fairy tale. As such i suggests to our stupor the injunction "Do What Thou Wouldst" or, quite bluntly, "Enjoy!"—which nowaday may be a liberating, even a revolutionary, slogan! In any case, it is al good clean fun. At times we ar shoved and beaten into risibility; then too the show contains some really daz ling hocus-pocus and such lines a "Mama took up writing plays when someone left a typewriter here by mistake."

The APA Company does this by now American "classic" play better than anything I have seen them do before The company's mood and mental composition is one of youthful good will Ellis Rabb's direction is right in ever respect. The actors play with a relaxation which is not simply technical bu a consequence of the honorable course they have pursued in the theatre. So everyone—even those not appropriately cast—is wholly engaging. And Rosemary Harris, though she must watch her weight, is delicious in what formerly seemed little better than a conventional ingénue role. Miss Harri brings to the part the right touch o comic awareness together with warm womanly canniness. (Only the dance Anna Laekersen of the Royal Danish Ballet at the New York State Theatre gave me as much pleasure in recen weeks. Her face reflects a composite of perpetual tearfulness with discarnate ecstasy, while her feet seem to tickle the earth with tender playfulness.)

You Can't Take It With You is the best show of the season—alas!

Two ex-G-men

San Francisco, Calif.

Dear Sirs: The article by William W. Turner ["Crime Is Too Big for the FBI, The Nation, Nov. 8] was an odd one. . . . In fact it was quite evident to me, after reading it, why the FBI neither assigned him to a critical field office (as he regrets) nor to an important investigation (which he bemoans).

Item: Lack of Comprehension — In criticizing the FBI for not investigating crimes over which they have no jurisdiction, Mr. Turner says "the bureau has pet crimes—bank robbery, kidnaping, car theft . . . in which it has chosen to specialize" and "in bank robberies the bureau takes its authority (to investigate) from a wisp of technicality" (preceding italics the writer's). As he should know, but seemingly does not, the FBI investigates bank robberies, kidnapings and car thefts because it was directed to do so by Congress in sections 2113, 1201 and 2312, respectively, of Title 18 of the United States Code. . . . "

Item: Lack of Knowledge—As to the FBI's alleged failure to investigate "organized crime," Mr. Turner suggests jurisdiction to do so under such federal criminal laws as interstate transportation of gambling devices, stolen property, white slave traffic, hijacking, bribery, unlawful flight to avoid prosecution "and a fistful of others." Briefly (for a proper response would take pages and I still would not have countered his "fistful"), national gamblers do not transport gambling devices interstate to any substantial extent (it is not necessary to do so), nationally organized theft does not exist, neither does interstate transportation of whores (I have not heard the term "white slave" in law-enforcement circles for forty years), nor hijacking (at least since Prohibition days except for a flurry during World War II). The bribery law applies only to federal officers. The Unlawful Flight to Avoid Prosecution violation occurs only when a person charged with a state crime flees the state. In my opinion the FBI is fully informed as to national criminal activities (I am somewhat skeptical of the phrase "organized crime"), but the problem is establishing a violation of federal criminal law. It is Congress that must provide these laws, not Mr. Hoover . . . .

Item: Thriller Mentality—Says Mr. Turner, "(The Mafia) is so powerful and tightly knit that it could exert a monopoly on illicit enterprises anytime it wanted." Says Luigi Barzini in The Italians, "(Mafia) is not a strictly organized association. . . . It is a loose and haphazard collection of heterogeneous groups. . . . "

Item: Poor Judgment—Mr. Turner disapproves of Mr. Hoover's disapproval of a "National Police Force." The Gestapo, the Kempei Tai, and others, were national police forces. They are dangerous; for a monolithic nation-wide police force can . . . imperil individual liberties. Further, it is not necessary. . . .

Item: Bias—Mr. Turner asserts the FBI has not caught anyone in the act of "incinerating a Southern church used as a civil rights meeting." Whether a meeting place is a church or a building with less emotional connotation, it is not a federal crime to commit arson (except of federal property). . . . In this connection (presumably) Mr. Turner quotes Mr. Hoover: "We can't wetnurse everybody who goes down South." I do not know the quote but would wager it was not said in connection with the burning down of a church. . . .

I am a former FBI agent.

Nicholas Alaga

Sausalito, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Mr. Alaga's viewpoint is contradicted by those who hold organized crime to be a new power elite in America: Robert Kennedy; the late Sen. Estes Kefauver; Edward Allen, former chairman of the International Association of Chiefs of Police committee on organized crime; retired Captain James Hamilton of Los Angeles, who established the Law Enforcement Intelligence Unit embracing sixty major departments to pick up the coverage duties the FBI sadly neglected, and a host of other authorities. Rather than developing a counterargument of his own, Mr. Alaga seems to have devoted himself to hair splitting and personal deprecation. Hence he employs irrelevancies (e. g., The Italians characterizes the Mafia in Sicily only, not its powerful American offspring); is self-contradictory (Why bother to excuse FBI lethargy if there is no organized crime?); and parrots tired Hoover canards (e. g., the chimera of a "National Police Force" as an incipient Gestapo. Proponents of anti-syndicate action urge a national clearinghouse, without police powers, that will override interagency jealousies). Mr. Alaga grudgingly concedes there are "national criminal activities," but contends the FBI's hands are tied. He should well know that what his erstwhile boss asks of Congress, he gets. Hoover would have had no more difficulty getting supplemental legislation on organized crime than he did in getting the statute of limitations lengthened after the Brink robbery went unsolved past the federal deadline, or in eliminating the seven-day waiting period previously required in kidnapings when there was no e dence of federal jurisdiction. . . .
has not only shrugged off the orga ized crime problem himself, but he h effectively blocked efforts of others cope with it. Thus he is still the p eminent police chief in this count
But many law-enforcement offic consider it tragic that his prest and influence far outweigh his acco plishments.

conomics of the Long War

The news media, electronic and printed alike, live drama; consequently nothing makes them happier an a confrontation, a clash of wills among titans. the disagreement between the President of the nited States and the Chairman of the Federal Rerve Board was pictured in gladiatorial terms, with illiam McChesney Martin fighting for tight money gainst the old Populist from the Southwest, beating s breast for easy credit, full employment and the reat Society. There may be some truth in this interetation of the Federal Reserve's hiking of the disunt rate by half a point, but it is not the whole truth, r even a major part. Mr. Johnson might well wish at Mr. Martin were his subordinate, to be fired at ill, but Woodrow Wilson and Carter Glass did not an it that way, and in the end Mr. Johnson may be ad that fiscal policy is not entirely in his hands.

Before the elections of last fall, a recession was execrted in 1966; the hope was that it would be mild. ut when the President acceded to a massive expanon of the war in Southeast Asia, the buoyancy of the conomy was assured. By this time, even high school ropouts know that the vitality of the U. S. economy epends on government spending, which as a practical atter means predominantly military spending. When e divisions began to move across the Pacific, a mater of $12 billion of unscheduled military spending egan to move into the budget. Bankers may have ad misgivings, but businessmen were happy. To ite only one minor item, The Wall Street Journal eports that the Defense Supply Agency, which had een estimating that it would need only 6.6 million ards of various fabrics in the first quarter of 1966, ow wants the textile people to produce 40.5 million ards. That sixfold increase may not be enough, and he agency is inserting an option clause in each prourement contract to allow for a 50 per cent increase. Vhat with military needs on top of brisk civilian usiness, a new class of textile millionaires may be in he making. Similar hopes may spring in other inlustries, and with a good chance of fulfillment.

Note, however, that even while Vietnam was a mere rush-fire war, a near-capacity situation existed in nost industries. Some were at 90 per cent, some ractically at full capacity. Few were starving for usiness. Now, with another Korean war (or worse) n the making, the prospect is for severe pressure on nany industries. Normally uneconomic equipment will e put back in operation, with consequent pressure on rices. As always in a war, the tendency will be for rices to rise to a level commensurate with the costs f the least efficient producers, plus a reasonable rofit. Unless prices are regulated, this means an uneasonable profit for the efficient producers. It also neans that the consumer boom must be braked in some way. The last thing the President wants is to play such a kill-joy role. That he and Secretary McNamara see what is coming is indicated, however, by their obdurate stand on aluminum and copper prices. Rollbacks, not increases, are needed in the situation now developing.

Chairman Martin has taken the initiative in checking the boom. Since almost everyone agrees with Mr. McNamara's prediction of a long war, further slowing down may be necessary. The President finds it politic to differ with Mr. Martin in public, but the hard-fisted banker emerged from the conference with the great Populist without a bloody nose. Privately, the President may be grateful to him. If he isn't now, he may be later.

The State Department's Nyet

Either President Johnson has no control over his State Department or he was not sincere in saying that he would support proposals for peace that came out of the White House Conference on International Cooperation.

The Arms Control and Disarmament Committee of that conference was properly teased by Sen. Joseph Clark for coming out "with a disarmament report that doesn't discuss disarmament," in a world-wide and complete sense. But even those major proposals that it did make—and they were bold by Johnsonian standards—were opposed by the State Department.

The committee, chaired by MIT's dean of science Jerome Wiesner, recommended that the United States take the lead in seeking a nonaggression pact between NATO and the Warsaw Treaty Organizations. To which Assistant Secretary of State John Leddy responded, with his own cheap definition of terms: "We shouldn't treat NATO and the Warsaw organization as similar. NATO is made up of free countries and the Warsaw Treaty rests on force." If such a man could be reasoned with, the only logical answer to that would be, so what?

To the committee's suggestion for promoting cooperation between East and West Germany that might "ultimately lead to some kind of confederation," Leddy again fell back on the old State Department line, its features worn smooth and meaningless by repetition, that federations are not acceptable but only "self-determination by free election." It is strange how that means to the State Department one thing in Germany and quite another in Vietnam.

The citizens group also urged a try at opening bilateral talks with Red China on arms control, and some preliminary gestures that might end with that nation in the UN. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State David H. Popper replied that merely because Red China has the atomic bomb leaves it "far from clear" why such steps should be taken. As for the proposal that all nuclear powers give 0.5 per cent of their military budget to the UN for peace-keeping purposes, Popper could hardly keep a straight face. One-half of 1 per cent, he reckoned, comes to $250,000,000 for peace-keeping, which seems "a bit generous."

Cut back the arms stockpiles by one-third, call a three-year moratorium on new deployment of ballistic missiles, stop the production of all nuclear arms and open all atomic energy plants, unilaterally if necessary, to international inspection—to these other recommendations the response from the White House has so far been a very loud silence.

Questions Unanswered

Both Sen. Jacob K. Javits and his colleague Robert Kennedy have asked publicly for a Congressional debate on Vietnam. If our Vietnam policy were the subject of free and searching discussion in the Senate, much that has been hidden from the public would be brought out into the open, and the present drive toward a bloodier, even more horrible war might be slowed, perhaps eventually stopped. Such a debate would deal with these questions, among others: (1) How did we get sucked into this whirlpool? (2) Why did we fail to get out when we were still on the periphery? (3) What is the inside story of our involvement with the French and, ultimately, our assuming their colonial role? (4) What induced us to install Ngo Dinh Diem as the ruler of South Vietnam, and later to abandon him? (5) Why did we repudiate the 1954 accord which, though we did not sign it, we had promised to respect? (6) What is the present state of graft and corruption in South Vietnam? Can it be confirmed that hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of the "economic aid" supplied by the United States to the government of South Vietnam is sold by that government to local businessmen?

If these matters were discussed, much else would come to the surface.

Great difficulties lie athwart the proposal for full debate. Not only might the American people be disillusioned; the enemy might prove to have been no more wicked than the people on our side, and so the picture of a righteous war would be badly stained. The parliamentary situation is also unfavorable. Soon the President will be asking for immense sums for the prosecution of the war. When that point is reached, opposition will be impossible—not one legislator in a hundred would dare to vote against, or even question, appropriations requested by the President to sustain troops in the field. But prior to such time, the Foreign Relations committees of the Senate and House are not likely to hold hearings on Senator Javits' resolution calling for hearings and debate, unless the State Department gives the green light, and the State Department will do nothing of the kind unless the President gives his consent, the chances of which are microscopic.

The ordinary voter who is paying the bills and sending his sons to be killed is not, however, without remedy. Nineteen sixty-six is an election year. By direct forceful contact with his Congressmen, on sufficiently wide scale, an investigation might cc ceivably be launched. Or petitions might be circulat and resolutions passed in which the Senate would urged to conduct open hearings on American policy Vietnam, to be followed by a full-dress debate. B the time is short.

The evil, in truth, is much greater than Vietna although that is the focus at the moment. The po World War II foreign policy of the United States h never been seriously debated since Henry Walla made his futile bid for the Presidency in 1948.

What need to be threshed out now are the larg assumptions, the objectives, the rationale if any, American foreign policy in the light of the experien of the last twenty years. We have never gotten t debate which, as citizens of a democracy, we are e titled to in law and equity, because so few Congre men are prepared to challenge the basic assumptio of the cold war.

If this challenge is not raised, and raised soo history will record that—with one exception— people was ever more cynically deceived than t people of the United States. The exception is not pleasant one. Germany, under Hitler and the Naz prepared for World War II without debate and wi all opposition silenced. But Germany, even under t Weimar Republic, was only a crippled democracy, a soon it was no democracy at all.

Social Engineering

Since engineering became a profession a few ce turies ago, the principal emphasis has been on co structive works. World War II and its sequelae chang all that, reducing many branches of engineering mere appendages of the military machine. Cloaked patriotism and rewarded with hefty increases in i come, the ethical degradation of an honored professi was scarcely noticed. Only recently have efforts rehabilitation been made, largely through the initi tive of Governor Edmund G. (Pat) Brown of Califo nia, who sensed an opportunity in the instability employment resulting from cancellation of big gover ment contracts. The Governor was assisted by the di taste of the aerospace companies for a public ima inseparably associated with mass murder. The resu has been a number of contracts whereby the state, a cost of $100,000 in each case, enlisted the servic of Aerojet-General for advice on waste disposal, Lockheed Missiles & Space on information manag ment, of North American Aviation on transportatio and of Space General on crime. Systems Developme Corp. was brought into the program in a general co sulting capacity.

Good ideas have a way of spreading. Mayor-ele John V. Lindsay has likewise turned to Systems D velopment to coordinate efforts of aerospace firms help solve the problems of New York City. On th federal level, Sen. Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin sponsoring a bill to make $125 million available ove five-year period for aerospace company studies of essing needs.

The results of the studies to date indicate that solu- ons can be found to a strikingly broad spectrum of oblems by the application of systems engineering, ich is based on the principle that a problem must viewed in its entirety by teams of trained men, and thout excessive reliance on traditional methods and chniques. Proposed solutions are not necessarily put use, but may be compared by simulation in models d high-speed computation. In the field of trans- ortation, for example, North American suggested that ate engineers be provided with a series of sub-models be used as planning tools. Aided also by computers, ey could then compare the cost and effectiveness available means of transportation in laying out ghway routes, instead of building the roads and scovering the faults later. For California, such a anning device would cost about $10 million—the ice of a single mile of urban freeway. North Amer- an also contends that even with today's technology, lvanced modes of travel, such as 500-mph tube ains, could break the vicious circle of more cars and ore express highways, which are filled to capacity on mpletion by still more cars.

A striking example of social prophecy emerged from ace General's crime study. Their engineers applied ve parameters—crime rate, school dropout rate, edian income, population density and percentage f minority group—to 100 neighborhoods in Los ngeles. Watts was at the head of the list in all five tegories of the report—submitted a month before e riots broke out.

Techniques and projects such as these can help to uild a truly great society. The danger is that with e expanding war in Asia, these and other promises f social health may be lost. "History," Veblen wrote, ecords more frequent and more spectacular instances f the triumph of imbecile institutions over life and ulture than of peoples who have by force of instinc- ve insight saved themselves alive out of a desperately recarious institutional situation, such, for instance, s now faces the people of Christendom." It remains be seen whether, despite these efforts at the reorien- ation of engineering, what Veblen wrote in 1914 will ot be applicable to the late sixties.

Vatts—The Sad Litany

At an expense of $275,000, the McCone Commission as issued its report on the Watts riots (see article . 490 this issue). The 101-page document, designed shed light on the causes, and if possible the cure, f an affray which resulted in thirty-four deaths (al- ost all Negroes), more than a thousand injuries, nd at least $40 million in property damage, showed o interest in Watts itself. Accordingly, some Negro aders were indignant, but the ordinary people of the eighborhood were indifferent. They gave the report he attention it deserved, which was very little.

There was nothing vicious about the conclusions reached by John A. McCone, former director of the CIA, and his seven colleagues on the commission: They were trying to be fair and constructive, but within the limits of politics and economics as usual. Except perhaps for the two Negro members (and then only in part) what they said could not on any account rock the foundations of the Establishment.

With this implicit limitation, the McCone report could only follow in the wake of numerous earlier efforts in the same genre. The first and most memorable was Charles Johnson's 1919 analysis of the Chicago race riots, which traced the effects of urbanization on the Southern Negro migrant to the big city. Since then, all the reports have been in that pattern, ritualized to such a degree that they constitute a kind of litany, deploring bad housing, police brutality, inferior schools, no jobs and all the other afflictions which, after the riot and the report, continue without significant change.

So with McCone. Actually the Los Angeles Times, in its series of articles on the Watts disorders, probed more sharply and deeply than the McCone Commission. For reasons of decorum and politics it was necessary, of course, for the Governor to appoint a commission, to assign a prominent citizen to head it, and to receive with appropriate gratitude the document over which the commission had conscientiously labored. But if the Times articles had simply been reprinted, the results would have been the same and $275,000 could have been devoted to some worth-while purpose.

The crux of the Watts situation is jobs. The rate of unemployment in Watts is several times that of the rest of Los Angeles and that is high enough — 5 per cent. Five thousand decently paying jobs would not cure all the evils of Watts by any means, but by giving men an occupation and an income it would improve the situation sufficiently to forestall another outburst. And that is all that white Los Angeles really wants. Yet even that modicum is unattainable. The money is available—about $18 million of the $29 million recommended by federal trouble-shooters after the dust settled. These funds have gone from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the City of Los Angeles, but the bulk of the money is not to be spent in Watts for immediate relief but on long-term, countywide anti-poverty projects.

There are several reasons for this pattern of procrastination. One that is particularly revealing is that Mexican-Americans are a bigger minority than Negroes, and equally underprivileged, and officials are reluctant to appear to be "rewarding lawbreaking." Another factor that can hardly encourage either the Mexican-American or the Negro-American communities is the departure of Mayor Yorty for Vietnam, where he is making what he regards as an indispensable survey of the war and how it is to be won. When the next riot will occur, and where, can probably be learned from a skillfully programed computer, but one needs only a pair of eyes and ears to know that another explosion will occur—and that another McCone-type report will follow as the night the day.

UN POWER SHIFTS

Decline of the Unaligned . . Anne Weill-Tuckerma

Twice in recent weeks, African countries have argued in vain before the Security Council for drastic United Nations action—against the white minority government of Rhodesia and against the Portuguese colonizers.

The Rhodesian crisis roused African wrath, not only toward the unilateral declaration of independence by the European settlers, but also toward the alleged duplicity of the United Kingdom which, they claimed, allowed or even helped the situation to develop to this extremity. An unprecedented seventeen delegations not members of the Security Council asked to participate in the Council debates on Southern Rhodesia; of these, fifteen were African and one was Asian. Their speeches carried the full measure of bitter "I told you so," and warnings of bloody events in Africa in case Prime Minister Ian Smith was not brought speedily to his knees. It was "obvious," said Diallo Telli, Secretary General of the Organization of African Unity, in the wake of the coup in Salisbury, that Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the chapter dealing with UN sanctions in cases of aggression or threats to the peace, would be brought to bear on the situation.

The resolution submitted by the Ivory Coast, the only African member of the Security Council, stated flatly that "the situation resulting from this declaration of independence constitutes a threat to international peace and security," and went on to call for the full range of sanctions under Chapter VII, from an economic and diplomatic boycott to the use of UN armed forces "against the racist minority settler regime."

These "obvious" maximum demands of the African states were never met. Instead, after innumerable sessions of vehement, if private, haggling, the Africans had to settle for a "minimum" Bolivian-Uruguayan resolution, which the Council adopted unanimously and which followed closely the outline of British policy. Britain had brought the case to the Security Council not only in order to be the first to do so, but also to ask for participation by the UN members in the economic and financial measures it had decreed immediately following the Rhodesian rebellion. Britain received the requested support from the Security Council. A call for an oil embargo was also written into the resolution,, perhaps earlier than the British Government had originally envisaged. But there was no more mention of Chapter VII or UN-imposed sanctions, and if language was strong and injunctions solemn, London kept full charge of initiating the future course of action. Foreign Secretary Michael Stewart went home after heading the British delegation in the Council with nothing more severe than a vague call to his government "to take all other appropriate measures which would prove effective in eliminating the authority of the usurpers and in bringing the minority regime in Southern Rhodesia to an immediate end."

Support by the United States for such a resolution was a foregone conclusion. Not so the assenting vote of the USSR which, in the not distant past, used to abstain on, or even veto, compromise resolutions which the African states considered insufficiently strong.

On the question of the Portuguese African colonies where the situation, chronically deplored in UN debates, has not deteriorated into a crisis, the Soviet Union sided with the

The governments of the new ountries, not limited to Africa, are erfectly aware of these problems nd have had to put off ideological attles in favor of more urgent eeds. Macpherson, Toronto Star

The emergence of China as Communist force distinct from he Soviet Union has brought addiional disruption to the Afro-Asian vorld. The Bandung conference, vhich in 1955 had consecrated the mergence of the new countries of Asia and Africa as a political force, ould not be repeated in Algiers in 965. If it had been held, the conference, instead of concentrating on common problems and world issues, would have served mostly as a forum for the Sino-Soviet rivalry. Countries wishing to remain unaligned in the ideological East-West conflict would have been caught square in the middle of the Byzantine Marxist ideological conflict. The decision to postpone indefinitely the Algiers conference coincided with a soft-pedalling of Algerian initiatives as one of the leaders of the nonaligned forces, which had met successively in Belgrade and Cairo. (More than sixty countries participated in the last Cairo conference of October, 1964.)

With the decline of Indian influence, the group of "uncommitted" nations became mainly African, the Asian countries, at least as far as the UN is concerned, being far fewer and their ranks being further depleted by the "unpersons" of Asian political life: China, North and South Vietnam and North and South Korea. Unaligned Arab countries, a source of division as well as unity, concentrated on their own specific problems. Yugoslavia, which had hitched its star to the nonaligned world, while keeping the hammer and sickle on its banner, became an artificial appendix of the African continent as a perennial co-sponsor of African resolutions. In five years, the five "wise men" who had been in the limelight of the 1960 UN "summit" General Assembly — Nehru, Nasser, Tito, Nkrumah and Sukarno—lost most, if not all, the influence they tried to wield as a group on big-power politics.

The change in big-power relationship left no room for a "third force" between the two opposing blocs which had, to a large extent, ceased both to be blocs and to be opposed. After several years of inflated influence, due in part to the East-West race for their favors, the new and nonaligned nations are once more by-passed on the international chessboard by big-power hegemony, now motivated primarily by the concern of Washington and Moscow over China. President Johnson's Administration has ceased to be preoccupied by the country's "image" abroad and has firmly set on a course based on considerations of realism and strength.

The fact is that ideology is playing a smaller and smaller role in international relations, and the East-West conflict as such has all but disappeared, except on specific issues like Germany. The present UN General Assembly has been characterized by a fairly harmonious relationship between the United States and the USSR, each one taking great pains to avoid a showdown on Vietnam. It is ironic that the height of ideological polemics came with the discussion of a Soviet declaration on the "inadmissibility of foreign intervention in the domestic affairs of states." The Soviet delegation was aiming at an Assembly condemnation of U.S. intervention in Vietnam, without naming any country. The American and the British delegation, in turn, entered the game in order to turn this condemnation into one against subversion and indirect aggression, meaning that of North Vietnam supported by China and abetted by the Soviet Union. It was a shameful spectacle indeed to see the three big powers, which have carefully avoided bringing before the Security Council the most serious war of this decade, carry on a nit-picking battle of words and definitions before the UN political committee.

Their unity of purpose has intimidated the nonaligned countries, many of which raised the question of Vietnam in speeches during the general debate, but none of which took any initiative to have the United Nations seek a way out of the war. Instead, two leaders of the group, Yugoslavia and Algeria, channeled their efforts toward the future convening of a world disarmament conference with the participation, if possible, of Communist China—an event which will depend on whether or not the United States and China pursue their present collision course. The repeated argument that the absence of China from the United Natic and its hostile attitude toward world organization doom UN effo in advance should not have p vented a bold debate in the Secur Council or in the General Assem on the Vietnam issue, and at le an attempt by powers not direc involved in the war to devise dras and dramatic measures to bri about a cease-fire and subseque negotiations.

If the nonaligned world want as it has claimed, to be the co science of the United Nations as primary force for peace, it has l this opportunity by sharing in t voluntary blindness of the intern tional organization toward the Vi nam conflict.

Riot as a Weapon

. . Stanley Sander

In all the analyses, post-mortems and search for causes conducted in Los Angeles after the Watts riots, there has been a solid reluctance to admit that the local events foretell changes for the Negro in America. The attempt to explain that violence entirely in terms of local conditions not only ignores changes within the national Negro community but actually obstructs a real understanding of those changes.

The Watts riots represent a marked and obvious shift in attitude among Negroes in Los Angeles. And, given the recent history of the Negro, it follows that from Los Angeles there stem national implications. Thus, it becomes immaterial whether Watts is or is not a "slum area"; whether criminal elements were or were not responsible for the rioting; or whether police brutality did or did not occur. The important thing is how Negroes are beginning to regard what they at least see as facts, and this new attitude is by no means confined to Los Angeles.

The change is based on shifts in the Negro's overall power position. From the expanded use of the vote has come political power. The Negro has made his purchasing power felt in certain locales, and his consumption pattern has affected the national market in some key commodities. And the unrelenting civil rights movement has brought domestic advances in the Negro's broad social position, in addition to moral advantages acquired through a sympathetic world opinion. As a result, he is learning about the rewards of bargaining in the American way of life.

But the favorable shifts in the Negro's position have given him only a taste of the tangy flavor of power. Wielding its weapons—the vote, boycotts, nonviolent demonstrations—he glimpses an even larger arsenal of possible weapons. These alternative weapons and strategies increase his bargaining position. If he can make violence work as an alternative to peaceful demonstration, he seems willing to try it. The Northern parallel of the "Negroes with guns" experiment in North Carolina, Louisiana and Mississippi showed itself in Watts last August. Where peaceful weapons do not operate, violence is an alternative. And, though this may come as a surprise to a public almost surfeited with reports of victory in the war for civil rights, the peaceful weapons were doing little for Watts.

I came home to Watts, after two years abroad, a week before the riots began. During the years away I h read much about the quickeni pace of the civil rights moveme and upon my return I was eager see what changes had been ma I was soon let down. The dism sameness of the neighborhood d turbed me most. Watts had not new building. The community sues, which were old two years a were now traditional. Police b tality was still alleged by a p sistent few and just as emphatica denied by an official few.

On first appearance it seemed only that Watts had been specta to whatever impact the civil rig movement was making on the Neg community but also that it did in the slightest share the dazzli growth of the Los Angeles are Watts seemed passive, neith swinging with the new progressi ethos of the civil rights moveme nor enriching itself by way of t Southern California bonanza.

It was, I thought, the same Wa I had known as a boy. To grow in Watts then was to have no esp cial pride in the community. It w a physical locale and a habit thought that one was expected outgrow. Local heroes moved awa went to the "westside," and seldo were heard from again. When graduated from high school and w preparing to leave for college, n advisers told me that, if peop ed where I was from, I should "south Los Angeles," not Watts. yone aspiring to success in the side world was expected to dis- iate himself from Watts. Nothing d was ever known of Watts; it s in the news only as the scene a knifing or shooting. And in itts no boyhood dream was com- te unless it included some kind deliverance from the burdensome gma.

The important differences ween that old Watts and the itts of today began to emerge for during a conversation before the ts with a high school classmate o had preceded me to college. We d always thought alike, but now, er the intervening years, we med separated by our different periences. He talked about con- ions in the city for "Afro-Ameri- ns," as he called Negroes, and d that he thought there were ore important things than a home d fine car." He was concerned it I should always remember my ginnings in Watts and reminded of his own experiences after col- ge. (Though a successful student, was never hired in the field of s academic specialty. Disap- inted, he joined the army, and ere suffered an injury that has t him slightly crippled. Soon after e injury he was discharged and er he married. He is still jobless.) e ordeal has left him embittered. one time active in the civil rights ovement, he now pays it little at- ntion. Most of his friendly rela- ns with white civil rights workers ve been severed. He is indifferent "integration," yet matters having do with race interest him now en more than they did two years o. What now concerns him is the lf-sufficiency of the Negro com- unity. After the riots he called to press his satisfaction, but regret- d that the riots had "stopped too ort."

The true history of Watts is the olution of a Negro community, d it thus makes better sense to scuss the Los Angeles riots within e context of the Negro in America an as a part of the civil rights ovement. For Watts, like the larger mmunity, may be affected by the ovement, but it is nevertheless an tity apart from the movement. It s absorbed some of the achieve- ents of the drive for civil rights d repelled others.

Discarding the civil rights framework in order to explain the riots may appear ironic, but in fact the separation between the Negro community and the civil rights movement is easily discernible. The real irony of the situation is that the successes of the movement are often mistakenly seen as satisfying some condition of the Negro community. When, to the dismay of many, the recent riots followed on the heels of the passage of the Voting Rights Act, the comment frequently made was "you give these people this great piece of legislation and what do they do; they go out and riot. It doesn't make good sense." But the civil rights movement and the Voting Rights Act are one thing, the Negro community and the riots are quite another. Hence, the riots cannot be discussed in terms of the old language. "The Cause," "advances," "setbacks" cannot explain the changes.

The riots introduced a new language. It is hardly intelligible to anyone outside the Negro community. Some evidences of the vocabulary of the new language can be gleaned from the tone of current Negro literature. The Fire Next Time, Negroes With Guns are recent titles that have meaning in the new context. The language is bitter and it smacks of desperate conduct and action. Yet, even worse, the nation's ear is not trained to recognize it.

For the first time Los Angeles heard from a little-known black man; a kind of gnome he was, a recluse in Watts; a Negro qua Negro, silent, invisible and until now always passive. Most of the time he has been the object of somebody else's action, relentlessly acted upon. When he met whites they were usually in a uniform—that of a policeman or a businessman—signifying some role antagonistic to the community.

It was no accident that the riots chose the police and the merchants as their targets. Initially, it was an incident with policemen that provoked the riots, but the policeman's presence is always at issue. He comes to the Negro community to impose a legal order so incompatible with its style of life and patterns of conduct as to make it seem that he is imposing an alien civil code. The charge often made that protests against police brutality are just a convenient cover up for a prevailing civic irresponsibility ignores the fact that the law and its agents reflect the dominant American mode of life, and that the Negro as a community is excluded from fully participating in that dominant mode. So the law that appears to be a form of order for the largest sectors of the population is in fact an inconvenience and a burden when applied to Negroes.

Unlike the policeman, whose presence is constant, the merchant confines his activities in Watts to business hours. The merchant was damned not so much for his unethical dealings—to be sure, the merchants are no more unethical in Watts than they are anywhere else—but, ironically enough, for his strict application of the American business ethic to Watts in particular. Watts has been made an exception to the rules of the larger community, but few allowances for the difference are ever made with respect to business. It is hardly recognized that business practices appropriate to Wilshire, Beverley Hills and other sections of Los Angeles are in nowise suitable to Watts. The merchant righteously tells his customer in Watts that his treatment is no different from the treatment of customers at the store across town. The fallacy in this pitch to the Negro customer is so obvious that it rarely goes unnoticed. If the merchant is to do business in Watts, the terms of his relationship with the customer must be keyed to the individual pocketbooks of the local citizens. Examples abound in Watts of goods being reclaimed and payroll checks being attached after a customer has failed on a single monthly payment. Negroes recognize the subtle, alternating pattern of partiality with impartiality and they talk about it.

The Watts riots were an assertion in still another direction. In addition to expelling the white presence, they created and exposed new reactions of the Negro to himself. The traditional roles were switched. The Negro was in the active role for the first time, doing the chasing and wreaking the havoc. To a people who have always been acted upon, rarely doing anything for itself or to communities outside, the riots were a bold departure from a long tradition of inertia. Admittedly, the fact that the activity was destructive is not irrelevant, but it is less important than the fact that rioting is for the Negro in Watts a form of expression. No one understands his problem or bothers to care. Few of his local leaders have the imagination or vision to articulate his special feelings to the outside world. Besides, it is the kind of story most Americans will protest that they would rather not hear. There, in Watts, the Negro is trapped and without a means of expressing himself or of making himself understood to the environment that surrounds him. Because of the inadequacy of the avenues open to him he resorts in desperation to rioting.

What seemed like a sudden reaction to his plight had in fact been developing in the Negro all along. It was sudden only in its manifestation. By his relegation to Watts, the Negro is forced to be conscious of the differences that place him there. The isolation serves to accentuate his awareness of his homogeneity. And it follows from this that the Negro resolves most of the differences that relegate and isolate him into one unique difference—that of race. To this race consciousness the Negro attaches many things—the sum of his reactions to this world we all live in, and to himself as the world about us changes. To be sure, the reactions he derives from this race consciousness are not consistently rational. But then, what human reactions are consistently rational? To be a Negro and aware of it serves as an organizing me anism that simplifies many thi for him, explains why certain ot things happen just to him and one else, and gives to him a just cation not only for reacting diff ently but for acting differently well.

The importance of the Los geles riots lies in the fact that

That it has now exploded in ra- violence only reinforces and ightens the race consciousness. e attempt to dispel it comes too e. While the rioting lasted, it di- led the city into two very obvious mps, but the intense race con- ousness that was manifested dur- the riots has not been erased w that the riots have ended. It es on in internalized forms. in w images and new possibilities.

There is a tragedy in the w prospect. It is sure to make ture relations between the Negro mmunity and the city somewhat ained at a time when both com- unities could profit by increased derstanding of each other. The stance that separated whites from groes before the riots is even eater today. The very understand- g the Negro solicits by rioting is rred by the effects of that rioting. an attempt to explode myths he s only magnified them. By re- rting to violence, that traditional ode of human expression, he has ade future expression and com- unication more difficult.

The problem of communication not new. Indeed the aftermath the rioting showed how vast the mmunication gap has always en. For one thing, the news media cked proper resources. One of the ajor metropolitan dailies had to re its Negro advertising agent to ver the area because it had no egroes on the reporting staff. A tional magazine with offices in Los Angeles nevertheless had no coverage for two full days because there was no one in the local office who could enter the riot area. Also, the news media were wholly without the experience to deal with the Negro population. After the riots had ended, Watts was practically overrun by press, TV and radio in search of the facts. But these media could find no reliable sources of information. It was apparent that most of the reporters were going about the task of covering the riot area in total darkness.

The lack of facilities and techniques for communication may have added to the difficulties. Many of the published facts about the riots were not even approximately true. Most outsiders simply could not distinguish between forms. The lack of experience with Watts led to gross generalizing. For example, most officials outside concluded that there was "no leadership in Watts," and this may be sufficient as far as the outside community is concerned. But they fail to realize that the citizenry of Watts is not a flock. Watts, too, is a community and therefore its leadership takes a variety of forms. There are political leaders, business leaders, religious leaders, et al. Whereas in the larger community the leadership resides most often in business executives and professionals, the same kind of leadership in Watts falls to the barber, the auto mechanic, the bartender. It is not so much that leadership does not exist but that the indigenous leadership takes forms which are largely unintelligible to those unfamiliar with the community pattern. The same social factors that make the law seem alien and the business practices unfair can account for the outsider's failure to discover "leadership in Watts." The problem in communication now is not so much a lack of interest in obtaining information; it is rather one of dealing skillfully with an unfamiliar community.

Unfamiliarity with Negroes exists on a popular level as well as among public officials. Indeed, the popular ignorance is more frightening. (A former roommate in college lived only 5 miles from Watts but had never been there.) And the unfamiliarity with Negroes is national. It is due partly to lack of opportunity to learn, partly to fear, partly to a long history of misconceptions about the Negro.

Riots in Los Angeles and the threat of riots elsewhere should serve to remind the nation of the Negro's growing restlessness. The sad facts of the Los Angeles story indicate that violence can easily occur in all the big cities of the North. And the problems are exceedingly difficult. For it is impossible to deal with the Negro as though he were something other than himself. To expect the Negro to become white in his thinking is to expect too much. Understanding can proceed only if there is a firm recognition of genuine differences. A failure to recognize the differences and to understand what they mean to the Negro will inevitably lead to more riots.

Who Cares About Cyprus? . .

Constantine Poulos

Nicosia, Cyprus

he Cyprus "problem" was not just ashed up on the shores of this is- nd, full grown like Aphrodite. The oblem was created; manufactured. his report of last March 26 to the curity Council, Mr. Galo Plaza, e United Nations mediator, wrote: he interests of these external par- es (United Kingdom, Greece and rkey) brought to the Cyprus ques- on a complexity of issues going yond any immediate question of e well-being of the Cypriot people."

Who, then, cares about the "well- ing of the Cypriot people"?

It might be said that President Johnson does. Twice last year he effectively blocked imminent invasions of Cyprus by Turkey. The President was concerned lest two NATO partners get into a nasty scrap (with NATO materiel); in addition, the British asked us to step in.

Perhaps the Russians care. They've provided the Greek Cypriots with obsolete but worthy tanks and small arms (from Czechoslovakia, via Cairo). But the Kremlin is really much more interested in eliminating the big British bases on Cyprus. And current Soviet flirtation with Turkey (a vastly more attractive prize) suggests little concern about the people of Cyprus.

And Nasser? He remembers those British bases as staging points for the ill-fated Anglo-French attack on Constantine Poulos, after many years as managing editor of the Colorado Springs Free Press and as editor-publisher of the Jamestown (N.Y.) Sun, has returned to the Middle East and the Balkans, areas which he covered for The Nation during the war and postwar years. He is now a correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Suez, and he'll do anything to annoy, harass and compromise British influence in this part of the world. So his meddling in Cyprus (he still helps finance the noisiest Greek daily newspaper there) has little to do with the well-being of the people of Cyprus.

Great Britain? It retains sovereignty over the areas maintained as military bases—those enclaves being in fact excluded from the territory of the Republic of Cyprus. It would have Cyprus NATO-ized only as a last resort. (The British bases are, it should be said, an important source of revenue for the government of Cyprus.)

Greece has legitimate emotional ties with Cyprus, but it also has decrepit, blind, frustrated, expansionist aims that are inextricably involved with its miserable domestic (Greek mainland) politics. These prevent any clear or consistent thinking on "the question"; and Greek politicians are at bottom less concerned with the well-being of the Greek Cypriots than with gaining more real estate.

Turkey (its population recently announced at more than 33 million) hypocritically proclaims an interest, but its "interest" is not in the less than 105,000 Turkish Cypriots. It, like Greece, exploits an emotional issue for internal political advantage. Its "fears" of Greece are ridiculous and of Cyprus ludicrous.

Perhaps it is naive in this age to expect genuine interest in the well-being of a mere half-million people, but Cyprus offers a timely model of insurgent nationalism, defiant colonialism, big-power selfishness, the ideological bankruptcy of cold-war partners and satraps, and retrograde late-19th-century diplomacy. (On the positive side it offers further proof of the great value of the United Nations.)

Twenty years ago Cyprus was a beautifully quiet, peaceful island. Its people, spared in both World Wars and insulated from mainstream postwar passions, were considerate, contented, warm, hospitable and, above all, peace loving. Their standard of living was certainly higher than that of their compatriots on either the Greek or Turkish mainlands. Illiteracy was comparatively low, working conditions were good, justice was more even-handed than in any other area of the Levant and the Cypriots were members of the British Empire.

But that was before the new winds of nationalism blew in this direction. It was before the royalist irridentists of Athens, using the classical excuse for expansionism ("Magna Grecia") as a cover up for their dismal failures in domestic affairs, started sneaking arms and men into Cyprus, and stirring Greek emotions on the mainland with irresponsible, hysterical propaganda for "the liberation" of Cyprus from the British. It was before Turkey suddenly became an ally of the West, a NATO partner, a CENTO member and a U.S. land-based aircraft carrier. And it was before Suez. The gods did not grant that Cyprus should remain an idyllic, happily unimportant island.

For example, the question of Red China's admission to the United Nations affected Cyprus. In 1954, Archbishop Makarios, then the leader of the Cypriot Greek community, persuaded the Greek Government to press the UN for a consideration of self-determination for the island. The British, obdurately opposed to any proposals of that nature, bargained with John Foster Dulles and, in return for rejection by the United States of the Cypriot plea, supported the continued blackballing of Peking.

Thus began in Cyprus on April 1, 1955, an underground struggle led by Col. George Grivas (underground name: Dighenis Akritas) and financed by Greece. It led to the unfortunately familiar cycle of terrorism and repression, more terrorism and more repression. Cyprus had been a useful though limited British wartime base, and a convenient detention camp for "illegal" immigrants to Palestine. Later, however, it became a strategic cold-war base. British installations in Cyprus do serve to bolster the Central Treaty Organization alliance and provide a promise of aid to Turkey, Iran and Pakistan in the event of Soviet aggression. The island is today the only solid British outpost in the eastern Mediterranean.

In the latter half of the 1950s, the British, disturbed (after Suez) by the diminution of their influence in this part of the world, regretfully decided to apply imperialistic approaches to the rise of Greek nationalism in Cyprus. No reasonable effort was ever made to understand, or accommodate, the aspirations the Greek majority on the island. O the contrary, the Turkish minorit (18 per cent) was incited into a illogical, and at times violent r sistance to Greek demands.

When forced to withdraw, th British predicted chaos and bloo shed. Indeed, they insured it by th disastrously unworkable Zurich London agreements of 1960, whic were framed by the British, gladl accepted by the Turkish Government, and forced on the Greek Cypriots by the Athens government (o whom, in turn, pressure was put b the U.S. State Department). S there has been bloodshed and som chaos in Cyprus, because as Th Economist of London (April 1964) wrote ". . . this most bizarr and complicated of constitution . . ." was imposed on the people o Cyprus by outsiders who were largely concerned with their own interests.

Cyprus was "granted" its independence, but its government wa shackled. How could understanding and good will prevail if those virtues were almost intentionally absent from the agreements themselves? How could the wishes, desires and hopes of the Cypriot (Greek and Turkish) be fulfilled i the agreements represented, simpl and baldly, the formalized extension of the self-centered policies of London, Ankara and Athens? In fact the agreements seem to have been deliberately designed to deepen th division between the two commun ties of the island.

The population of Cyprus wa considered as constituting two entities, Greek and Turkish, which in spite of their numerical disparit were placed on an equal level as fa as the exercise of political powe was concerned. The Turkish minority was given such extensive right as to be in a position to paralyze th state, to thwart the will of the majority, and to block the progress o a young, new state. The predominantly Greek population (four t one) was, in effect, under a continuously threatening cloud of political blackmail. (This includes th Turkish Government's incessan threats of invasion.) The ensuin dualism made majority rule impossible and official administration unworkable. The minority could an did—under the agreements—effec rely block and frustrate the ma- rity.

On November 30, 1963, Arch- shop Makarios, President of Cy- us, proposed a number of changes, ly argued. It was a calm plea for ajority rule with adequate minori- safeguards. To quote again from e report of Mr. Plaza:

> Several of the most important mendments proposed by the Pres- dent reflected deadlocks which had ctually occurred in the functioning of the Constitution. For example, n proposing that the right of veto of the President and the Vice Pres- dent should be abolished, he referred to the fact that the latter had vetoed a majority decision of the Council of Ministers that the organizational structure of the Cyprus army should be based on mixed units comprising both Greek-Cypriots and Turkish-Cypriots, since the Vice President had favored separate units. Again, in proposing that the constitutional provisions requiring separate majorities for the enactment of certain laws by the House of Representatives should be abolished, the President cited the failure of the House to enact an income tax law. Similarly, he proposed that unified municipalities should be established on the grounds that the constitutional provision for separate communal municipalities in the five main towns had proved unworkable, one reason being the failure of the President and Vice President to reach agreement on the determination of the boundaries.

It can be argued that the Archbishop knew what the consequences would be. But, to give the prelate his due, he certainly would have preferred that the Turkish minority willingly accept the changes, discuss hem or at least propose alterna- ives. The proposals would have required, of course, the approval of he Turkish minority and the three signatory "powers," Great Britain, Greece and Turkey. As it was, the Turks answered with gunfire with- n three weeks after Archbishop Makarios announced his proposed changes.

The Turkish Cypriots took the Archbishop's proposals as a declaration of war. Some Greek Cypriots may have expected this reaction, but the Turks moved faster and in a way that the Greeks had not expected. The Archbishop's timetable was thrown off. Full-scale fighting broke out on Christmas Day, 1963.

Recourse to the UN was a bold maneuver on the part of the Cypriot President, who had literally been bullied by the British not to do so. British Acting High Commissioner Cyril Pickard misplayed his hand completely.

"We told the Archbishop," said the desk-banging Britisher, "...there will be a NATO force on the island. . . . This is not a matter for the United Nations. . . . The Treaty of Guarantee cannot be abrogated unilaterally. . . ."

Faced with the situation they had created, the British suddenly preferred to make it a NATO issue. Thus, they would retain their primacy, hold the Greek and Turkish Governments at bay through the alliance, placate U.S. public opinion, and keep the meddling Soviets and the grinning Nasser out of the picture. It didn't work out that way. The British were wrong, and almost nothing happened as they had hoped.

It was the British who built up Grivas, the man who was to haunt them. He was an absolute nonentity until the British in 1944 started secretly to supply him with arms to fight the leftish-led anti-Nazi resistance movement in Athens. (And having fallen for this malarkey, the CIA proceeded—twenty years later—to do the same thing. The United States sent Grivas back to Cyprus as insurance against "communism." Today in Cyprus he commands no respect, no honor and no authority.)

Britain's answer to the nationalist aspirations of the Greek Cypriots was the promulgation of "anti-sedition" laws, the declaration of a state of emergency, the dispatch of special commissions to "find solutions," the drafting of "new" constitutions (totally unacceptable to the Greek Cypriots), the incitement of the Turkish minority, the establishment of large prisoner camps, the handing over of unarmed Greeks to the Turks, the "dead-or-alive" rewards for Greek Cypriot guerrilla fighters, the deportation of Archbishop Makarios, another Greek bishop and two other Greek Cypriots to the Seychelles Islands, and on and on. Even today the British, faced with a possible loss of their unilateral preferred position (although Cyprus is a member of the Commonwealth), are reacting with a posture of feigned benignity that belies their true actions.

The vice commander of the UN peace forces (UNFICYP) is a British general. Almost the entire UN liaison staff was made up originally of British intelligence officers. UNFICYP communications have been almost entirely in the hands of the British. There is a plausible explanation: the British "know" the island, they have an excellent ready-made communications system, and who else but the British forces could quickly produce officers who spoke both Greek and Turkish?

But how to explain the case of a British airman (in civilian clothes) and his wife who were arrested for transporting arms and messages to the Turks in Nicosia? (Great Britain is the only national contingent in UNFICYP which has a distinct "interest" in Cyprus.)

The spurious justification for British policy on Cyprus has long been based on the allegation that self-determination for the island will be the prelude to Communist takeover. This argument is quickly parroted by the U.S. State Department. A New York Times dispatch from Washington (June 17, 1964, International Edition) based on an official background briefing, spoke of the "mounting concern in the [U.S.] administration over the Cyprus problem, both in terms of a threatened Greek-Turkish war and of the danger of the communization of the island."

In point of fact, there were more Communists on Cyprus when it was under British suzerainty than there are now. One abortive effort by the British to placate the restive nationalism of the Greek Cypriots in the late forties was the offer of "semi-self-government" and the appointment of a Committee of Arbitration. With the exception of two or three individuals, the only Greek Cypriots who supported and participated in this endeavor were the Communists.

The Communists have some influence on the island, for although a tiny minority they are a well-organized political force. But there wasn't one known Communist in EOKA, the Greek Cypriot resistance movement. And President Makarios holds such a pre-eminent popular position that he has effectively neutralized the Communists and can continue to do so.

The "Communist" issue is as phony as all the other issues from all the other sources (Greece, Turkey, U.S., Soviet Union, U.A.R.) have been for decades. "Enosis" (the union of Cyprus with Greece) is another phony issue. It's an old bugaboo used by the English to stir up Turkish reaction and to preserve British primacy. The Turks cite it to justify such actions as their cruel bombing attack of defenseless, unarmed Greek villagers in August, 1964. The Athens Greeks must shout for it to bolster their weak political positions in Greece. (The Athens government subsidizes a daily newspaper in Nicosia.) But most Cypriot Greeks today want to be on their own. They are fed up with maneuvering; with "being used." Their small country is now an independent republic and a member of the United Nations. That is how they would like to keep it.

What the Cypriots want and should have is self-determination. The British Government adamantly supported a "one-man, one-vote" platform in Rhodesia—but it stoutly opposes the application of this exact formula to Cyprus. The right of majority rule in Rhodesia appa ently is not quite the same as m jority rule in Cyprus. (What wrong with sanctions threats both the Ankara and Athens go ernments?)

So it is up to the United Nation If, over the objections and obstru tions of the U.S., the U.K., Turke and possibly Greece, the United N tions would eventually vote for supervised plebiscite on self-determ nation with specific, sensible h man-rights guarantees, peace coul be restored to Cyprus.

Snoopers & Tappers

Fred J. Cook

In the office of Bernard Fensterwald, Jr., chief counsel for Sen. Edward V. Long's investigation into the invasion of privacy, there hangs a framed placard that was discovered by committee field men in the Bell Telephone Laboratories in New Jersey. On the left-hand side of this expressive poster there is the large replica of a telephone with dangling receiver (it has obviously just been lifted off the hook), and alongside runs this large-type injunction:

> "Remember . . .
> No Classified Conversations."

When Bell Telephone finds it necessary to advise its employees to beware of its own most hallowed device, Big Brother has indeed moved into our lives. Just how various and unprincipled is that invasion Senator Long's investigation is steadily documenting. It is uncovering a world dedicated to the proposition that power provides its own justification.

Devotion to the theology of power is producing many weird manifestations. Fensterwald and Senator Long were shocked when the Secretary of the Treasury refused to let them question certain Internal Revenue agents. For the first time in history, as far as Fensterwald could determine, it became necessary for a Congressional committee to subpoena federal agents to get them to testify — and even then testimony at times flew in the face of truth. Almost every phase of the investigation has been marked by the obvious determination of government employees on the witness stand to uphold departmental policy and deeds at any cost. "The thing that has impressed me most," says Fensterwald, "is the ease with which federal agents can lie under oath."

The imperviousness of agents to any consideration except the demands made upon them by their bureaucratic superiors runs like a police-state theme song through the testimony of witness after witness. Senator Long points out that many revenue agents got permission, and sometimes the help of specialists, to install wire taps on the phones of suspects from the office of the deputy chief of Intelligence in the Internal Revenue Service.

Yet the deputy chief's records gave no indication of such activity. Asked why, the deputy chief replied, "if I had kept a record for any of my superiors, if I had asked them, they would have said, 'You know the regulations, anybody who does this is on his own.'" The deputy chief explained that his superiors knew the wire tapping was going on, that they even discussed it from time to time, "particularly when we got caught." Describing this testimony in The Saturday Evening Post, Senator Long commented: "What a remarkable code of conduct for 'devoted and courageous' law-enforcement officers—go ahead and break the law, bu don't get caught!"

The police-state mentality tha infects so many federal agent showed perhaps most clearly i the committee's Miami hearings Questioning an IRS agent, Senato Long asked whether he would brea a state law if ordered to do so b his superiors. Without hesitation the agent answered, "Yes, sir." Didn't he realize, Long wanted t know, that the essence of a polic state was for an officer to violate th law on the pretext of enforcing it "That may be the basis of a polic state; I do not know," the agen answered—and it was obvious t Senator Long that he didn't care All that mattered was that his orders should be carried out.

This "super gung-ho attitude, as Fensterwald calls it, produce results with shocking overtones. In one Boston case, Jack Harris, a Internal Revenue Service undercover man, was indicted in a $1,50 bribery case and suspended. Enraged by what he claimed was frame-up, he came to the committee and spilled a lot of details abou investigations carried out by th Boston IRS office. His principal tal dealt with surveillance of one Bernard McGarry, a Milton, Mass. tavern owner.

As Harris later testified befor the committee, McGarry had a hostile neighbor who made his barn available to the revenue sleuths The agents set up a lookout statio in the barn loft, and with snooper opes and other long-range devices pt the McGarry home under nstant observation. According to arris, they even watched Mrs. cGarry as she took a sun bath. he IRS agents had learned that e McGarrys had a large vault in e basement; and when they saw om the barn loft that the whole mily was absent, Harris entered he house and padded downstairs the vault.

Instead of a cache of illicit loot hich the revenue boys had hoped find, Harris discovered that the ult was unlocked and was being used for nothing more nefarious than the storage of the family's coats and fur pieces. He dutifully copied down the names of the clothiers and furriers on the labels and left the premises little wiser than he came.

He had, of course, fractured the law by this unauthorized entry into what is supposed to be a man's castle, and his account of the exploit threw IRS into a tizzy. Harris' boss at the time, Robert Ferrick, acknowledged that the McGarry home had been kept under observation from the barn loft—but only, he insisted, to read the license numbers of cars coming to the house, not to observe a lady sun-bathing. There had never, never been such an episode as the illegal entry and snooping Harris had described.

This was a head-on collision of testimony, and the committee never could determine the truth though there were some indications as to where it might lie. "There was one part of the undercover man's story that seemed to check out," Fensterwald says. "We learned that IRS had contacted the furriers and clothiers whose names appeared on the labels in an attempt to find out how much the McGarry family spent for clothing. And then there was one other thing. . . . " To wit:

Harris, in his testimony, had told the committee that, when he entered the McGarry home, another IRS agent had been stationed outside, patrolling the street in a radio car and keeping in constant two-way contact to guard against a surprise return home by the family. Fensterwald promptly demanded that the IRS produce this witness, John Crowe. The next day, the service complied, but Fensterwald was shocked by the appearance of the man when he was summoned to the stand.

"His face was flushed as if the blood was about to pop through the skin," Fensterwald recalls. "And as he testified, his head kept lolling back as if he was about to pass out on the witness stand. I made up my mind to get him off the stand as quickly as possible and so I asked him only the most essential questions."

Under these circumstances, Crowe promptly upheld his supervisor, Ferrick. Harris had been wrong, he said. No revenue agent had ever entered the McGarry home. Fensterwald was about to excuse this obviously ill witness when he received an anonymous note from the audience: "Ask him if he's under house arrest."

Fensterwald shakes his head at the recollection. "Well, one thing I've learned in this investigation," he says, "is not to disregard such tips—too many of them have panned out." So he turned back to the witness stand and demanded: "Are you under house arrest?" Crowe sat there silent, obviously stunned by the question.

"He was mute for a good half-minute," Fensterwald recalls, "then he shook his head and muttered weakly, 'No, I wouldn't say so.' His manner clearly swore at the answer he gave and convinced me that he was under house arrest."

Not daring to cross-examine Crowe the way be would a healthy witness, Fensterwald excused him, but he determined to delve into this new aspect of the case. "We learned," he says, "that this man had been flown down to Washington under guard; he had been kept under guard in his hotel room; he had been conducted to the hearing under guard by a man who denied he was armed, but who exhibited a mighty suspicious bulge under his jacket."

After the hearing, Crowe tried on a couple of occasions to approach some of Fensterwald's investigators. "But he could never get the chance," Fensterwald says. "Every time he approached one of our people, the guard came up and broke it off."

Fensterwald protested to IRS about forcing a man so obviously ill to take the witness stand; he made it clear he wouldn't have called Crowe if he had known about his precarious physical condition. Oh, think nothing of it, IRS replied; Crowe wasn't seriously ill, he just had a little upset stomach. A few weeks later, Crowe died of a heart attack.

Everywhere Senator Long's committee has turned, it has come across the dinosaur tracks of Big Brother. Invasions of privacy, it has established, are legion and permit the average American almost no security of thought or communication. But to get the truth about such snooping and prying has often proved infinitely difficult. Take, for example, the behavior of the Post Office Department.

The committee was greatly interested in the process known as the "mail cover." Under the buddy-buddy system that exists among federal agencies, the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Internal Revenue or any one of a half dozen other bureaus may ask the Post Office to keep watch on the mail of a suspect or of his family and associates, and the request will be honored on the supposition that the purpose, considering the source, must be valid. In theory, the Post Office keeps a record only of what appears on the outside of letters—details like the names and addresses of correspondents and the origin of the mail. Fugitives from justice are sometimes tracked in this way when they try to get in touch with relatives, and in such cases legitimate ends may be served. But even then, according to stated policy, the contents of the envelope are kept inviolate.

This picture of a scrupulous department zealously guarding our rights while it indulges in only the most necessary snooping against persons involved in actual crimes was fed to the committee on February 23, 1965, the day after George Washington's birthday, by Chief Postal Inspector Henry B. Montague. "The seal on a first-class piece of mail is sacred," Montague intoned in a carefully prepared statement. "When a person puts first-class postage on a piece of mail and seals it, he can be sure that the contents of that piece of mail are secure against illegal search and seizure. The only time first-class mail may be opened in the postal service is when it can neither be delivered as addressed nor returned to sender. Then, it is treated by trusted employees in the dead-letter office to determine whether it contains any information to establish ownership. . . . Mail is neither delayed nor opened. . . . Citizens must have confidence in their mail system or they lose it in other governmental institutions." (Italics added.)

Montague acknowledged that the postal form on which the details of the mail cover were recorded was to be destroyed after the deed was done, but he saw nothing wrong in that. Surveillance is a very secretive business, and you just naturally don't leave anything lying around that might indicate to the object of your attention that he has been watched. Fensterwald noted that the form also contained space for recording detail on second-, third- and fourth-class mail, all types that can be appropriately opened for postal inspection, and wondered if perhaps inspectors ever pried into such envelopes.

> Fensterwald: In the case of a mail cover do you ever examine mail which you legally have the right to examine?
> Montague: No.
> Fensterwald: You have every right to open second-, third- or fourth-class mail, don't you?
> Montague: That is for posta inspection, yes.
> Fensterwald: And never, i connection with a mail cover, d you open such mail?

The committee was susp cious, but on March 1, Postmast General John A. Gronouski wro Senator Long explicitly: "The mail neither delayed nor opened, and t contents of first-class mail are n examined in connection with mail cover." The Postmaster Ge eral italicized that "not."

By April 13, these positive a explicit assurances from the hig est Post Office officials had acqui ed a decidedly tarnished look. that date, Rep. Durward G. Hall, Missouri, appeared before the co mittee and testified that first-cla mail was indeed being opened. had received a complaint from constituent, the Congressman sai and though he couldn't believe he knew the complainant as responsible individual. So he chec ed with both the Post Office D partment and Internal Revenue. was assured at first, as the co mittee had been assured, that such thing could ever happen. Pi ning the departments down to t one specific case, the Congressma asked them to put their denials writing—and suddenly he encou tered a strange shyness toward t printed word. It developed th there was, indeed, a procedure which the sanctity of first-class ma was being violated. In cases whe Internal Revenue had secured t liens against defaulting taxpaye first-class mail was being deliver by the Post Office to IRS and w being opened by IRS agents to s whether it contained assets clues to assets. Just how wid spread was this practice? Repr sentative Hall discovered that one seemed really to know., He te tified:

> The Post Office Department ad vises me that since December o 1962 there have been fourteen suc seizures. The Internal Revenu Commissioner, on the other hand advised me on Friday of last wee that there had been thirty seizure since December of 1962 as far a their national office knows. . . . No is this the only conflict. Once th hand is caught in the cookie jar the contradictions multiply.
> On Friday of last week, four day after I advised the House of wha was happening and moved for co

rective action on the annual appropriations bill, the Postmaster General is quoted as saying that he himself discovered the seizure of mail as long ago as last August, and he said he picked up the phone and agreed with Doug Dillon that it was a bad thing and we stopped it.

It is interesting to note that, first, the Postmaster General waited half a year to disclose this, and then only after someone else called attention to it.

But unexplained, and second, Mr. Chairman, is if the Postmaster General found out about this violation of the law as long ago as August of 1964, and ordered it stopped, how does it happen that the General Counsel advised me, in writing, that the last seizure, a specific instance, took place almost three months later on October 27, 1964?

And, one might feel impelled to ask, how did it happen that both Chief Inspector Montague and Postmaster General Gronouski were assuring Senator Long's committee, in the most explicit terms, in late February and early March, 1965, that first-class mail was always regarded as sacred and was not (the Postmaster General's italics) opened?

Chief Inspector Montague, who followed Representative Hall on the witness stand, had the unhappy task of trying to reconcile past pretenses with present disclosure. It went like this:

> Senator Long: Let me ask you, Mr. Montague, you have known for some time, of course, that the Internal Revenue Service did levy on mail—first-class mail of the citizens were opened by people other than the addressee?
> Montague: I know that there was such a thing—I was aware that there was such a thing as a levy on mail; yes, sir.
> Senator Long: How long have you been aware of that, Mr. Montague?
> Montague: I think that I first became aware of it back in—I don't know, 1962 or 1963.
> Senator Long: Were you aware of that when you testified before our committee some weeks ago?
> Montague: It did not come to my mind, but I did know there is such a thing as a mail levy, yes. (Emphasis added.)

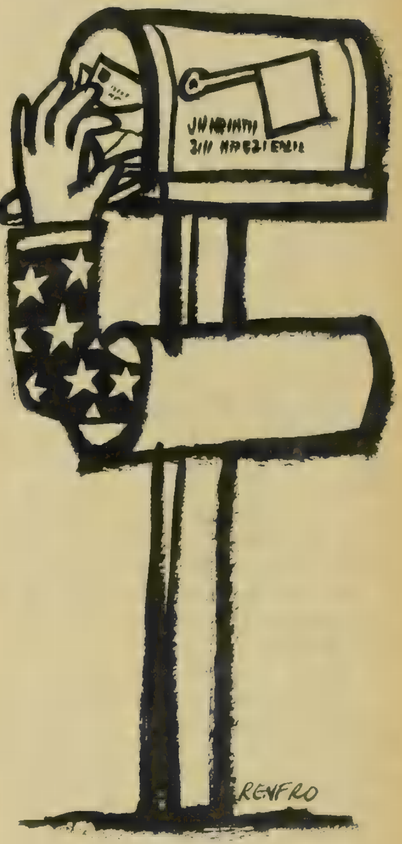
Montague conceded that the department knew of thirty-four cases in which mail had been opened and examined by Internal Revenue before being forwarded to the recipient, but he argued that "levies" were different from the "mail cover" he had been discussing in his previous testimony; that the Post Office's legal brains had assured him levies were legal, not illegal, and he had been dealing in his testimony only with "illegal" practices. Senator Long, exasperated by what he called this quibbling with terms when the truth had been one thing and the initial pretense virtually the opposite, finally snapped: "The further we get into this investigation, the more I am impressed with the idea that the Post Office should deliver the mail and not pry into it."

Hardly anyone believed that the full story had been told or that the only mail being opened was that "levied" upon by Internal Revenue. Fensterwald's investigators privately developed quite a dossier on things that can happen to the mail—and presumably do. Penetrating solutions can be rubbed on the back of envelope flaps to loosen the gum and enable a snooper to open a letter without trace. One of the best methods, Fensterwald says, is still the old one of steaming open the flap. Another simple way of spying is to immerse a letter in a solution of cleaning fluid. This brings up the contents, but one must be careful not to wiggle the letter around in the solution lest the envelope become softened and messed up. A much more sophisticated method borrows a device from the medical laboratory, the cystoscope. Insert one end of this pencil-thin instrument under the flap of a letter, switch on the cystoscope's powerful light, and you are examining in great detail not the human bladder but the contents of "sacred" first-class mail.

How widely are these methods used? That question the committee has not yet answered and perhaps can never answer. Representative Hall testified that he had some information that the Post Office Department was tampering with mail other than that "levied" upon by Internal Revenue, but he had not yet been able to verify his information.

Verification is, of course, extremely difficult. One may see, as I have, first-class mail arriving at his home mysteriously unsealed—and third- or fourth-class mail showing up with flaps ripped apart, sometimes so badly that it seems likely some of the contents have been lost — but how is one going to prove that this was done deliberately by the snooper's paw? All that can be said is that a lot of detectives and knowledgeable persons in other walks of life today distrust the mails — and the patent evasions of the highest officials of the Post Office Department before Senator Long's committee did nothing to bolster confidence.

It must not be supposed that such activities are confined to the Post Office and the Bureau of Internal Revenue. No one has yet compiled a definitive list of all the federal agencies engaged in prying into the private affairs of citizens, but even the skimpiest survey shows that it must be an unholy lot. What the military and such super-secret outfits as the Central Intelligence Agency are up to, no one knows, for they are all wrapped in the cocoon of national security. A former military intelligence agent has recently revealed on nation-wide television that the hotel rooms of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt were bugged every time she visited Chicago during World War II.



Mrs. Roosevelt maintained contact with a lot of labor and liberal leaders—and that, apparently, was enough to justify to the military mind the incredible eavesdropping on the First Lady's slightest word and deed. The military at the time was intent on protecting the initial atomic bomb researches, and it tapped and bugged everything in sight—the hotel rooms of scientists, the laboratories in which they worked, even ladies' rooms and men's rooms. And this, remember, was back in the dark ages of technological eavesdropping.

The Long committee inquiry has established that even outfits like the Food and Drug Administration go in for electronic snooping. The Federal Bureau of Investigation. whose director, J. Edgar Hoover, has insisted for years that it taps only in national security cases and then only on instructions from the attorney general, was revealed to have been tapping all over Kansas City in its drive on gamblers. And even the U. S. Bureau of Roads, according to one of Fensterwald's investigators, has its own dedicated snoopers, men so expert electronically that they have been able for the past fifteen years to turn your home telephone into a gadget of snoopery.

"The mike in your telephone is one of the most delicate and perfectly engineered instruments in the world," says one of Fensterwald's investigators. "It makes a perfect listening device."

Emanuel Mittleman, a Brooklyn electronics expert who heads what he calls the Wireless Guitar Co., demonstrated for the committee how easily the home telephone can be turned into a bug that will transmit everything from the baby's squall to the small talk between his parents. A tiny device selling for $400 is attached inconspicuously to the subscriber's telephone equipment, either somewhere along the line between the phone and the box or inside the box itself. The gadget can be attached in a few swift minutes; and, once it is in place, the phone can be turned into a listening device from any place on the long-distance dialing system. As the eavesdropper dials the last number of the gimmicked phone, he blows a C-note from a harmonica over the line. This note keeps the phone from ringing and turns it into a bug that picks up every sound within its considerable hearing perimeter. The device that makes this kind of intrusion possible draws so little power from the telephone line that it is almost impossible to detect it by ordinary scanning procedures. It cuts out automatically the instant the phone is picked up for a normal call, so there is no suspicious interference on the line to make the telephone user wary. Only if an extremely suspicious man should minutely examine his own telephonic equipment could the transformation of telephone into bug be discovered.

Perhaps the most disturbing feature about all this surveillance is the fact that our privacy is in pawn to great-power complexes, none of whom defend our interests, all of whom play footsie with one another. Bell Telephone, for example, had more than commonly good reason to know, when it posted that admonition against telephone conversations in its New Jersey laboratories, that its own lines were extremely vulnerable; it had more than commonly good reason to know because Bell itself, in many instances, has willingly collaborated in breaching the security of its own system.

In Pittsburgh, Fensterwald discovered, the chief of intelligence for Internal Revenue had had special telephone lines run into his own home to facilitate his wire tapping. He had also purchased from obliging Bell one of its own telephone trucks, and had dressed his men up as telephone company employees to facilitate their entry into residences and businesses. Bell, it would seem, could hardly have remained in complete and innocent ignorance of this brazen setup.

In Kansas City, the collaboration of Bell was all-inclusive and undeniable. The Southwestern Bell Telephone Company had a standing arrangement with authority: any telephone that the chief of detectives or the FBI wanted tapped Southwestern Bell would help to tap. It would not actually install the tap itself, but it would show the tappers just where the "pairs" of the line they were interested in were located in a terminal box and it would run special lines to a pole in the vicinity, thus easing the burden of labor for the tappers.

Chief of Detectives James R. Newman testified that any time he wanted to tap a phone he made a request "to the security officer of the telephone company," and he always got the information and help he needed. Detective Lieutenant James B. Hitchcock, in charge of electronic activities in the Kansas City department, acknowledged that information obtained from [illegible] taps was freely exchanged among the law-enforcement fraternity. He wouldn't actually give the representative of another agency a tape, he said; but in a friendly chitchat over morning coffee, he might tell him what was on the tape. To maintain the façade of ethics, there would probably be nothing in the beneficiary agent's written report to indicate that he had obtained the detail from a tainted source. He would merely note that his inside information came from "a confidential informant."

Everything that Southwestern Bell would do for the Kansas City police, it would double in spades for the FBI. Despite J. Edgar Hoover's frequent and passionate assertions that the FBI does not wire tap except to save the nation, testimony in the Kansas City inquiry showed that special lines were constantly being run into FBI headquarters on the 7th floor of the Post Office Building, at 1425 Baltimore, to facilitate wire tapping of suspected gamblers on almost a city-wide scale. A number of Southwestern Bell employees testified about one striking incident in late 1961 or early 1962, when they attempted to erect a public phone booth on a sidewalk just to advance the cause of FBI bugging.

The plans called for the booth to be placed against the outside wall of a building at Ninth and Central. Once the booth had been installed, ostensibly for the public's convenience, FBI agents were to insert a pin-head listening device in the wiring of the connecting block of the telephone box. This device was so sensitive that it would have picked up and relayed every word said inside the building. Unfortunately for these plans, the proprietor became suspicious. He rushed out to the sidewalk and demanded to know whether the telephone workers had written permission from the owner of the building to install the booth; they didn't, and he chased them. Paul J. Schmitt, a Southwestern Bell supervisor, testified that such tap installations were always "ordered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation," and in the instance of the blown phone-booth aper, he declared, "I had the servce order" to run a connecting line nto Kansas City FBI headquarters.

With the sanctity of telephone lines being violated at the merest nod of an official head, the nevitable has happened: a general mpression has been fostered that here isn't anything much wrong with the game and that everybody might as well get into it. Private deectives in Kansas City joined in the wire tapping free-for-all and quickly earned that they could get all the nformation they needed by bribng telephone company employees. George W. Robinson, one of the local private eyes, told the Long committee frankly that he had tapped telephone lines, and said that he always got the necessary information about the number of the "pairs" and the location of the terminal box from a confederate inside the company.

Fensterwald: Could you tell me what the going rate is?

Robinson: In the vicinity of between $50 and $100; it all depends on the man's attitude when you make the contact.

When the rampant wire tapping of Kansas City became known, the man on the spot was the telephone official who had authorized so much of it. He was Arthur S. Brewster, a lawyer and the division security supervisor for Southwestern Bell (his primary responsibility, as he himself described it, was to make certain of the security of company property and service, including the privacy of customers). He testified, however, that he had worked hand in glove with the FBI "ever since I have been in this job." Senator Long wanted to know if tapping didn't raise "some question about the invasion of privacy and the violation of the constitutional rights of any citizen that any agent might point his finger at." "I would assume that question could be raised," Brewster replied, almost primly.

The telephone company's man said that any time Chief of Detectives Newman or the FBI asked him to breach security, he cooperated, because he relied implicitly on their integrity. As for running special lines into FBI headquarters to facilitate the tapping, Brewster attempted to argue that this was a regular company service, advertised and available to all comers. Senator Long hopped on the rationalization. Then, he demanded, the company would provide such accommodations for private detectives, wouldn't it? Oh, no, said Brewster, obviously horrified. Why not? If this were a purely commercial transaction, why shouldn't it be sold to anyone who had cash in hand? Brewster protested that private detectives and other agencies "don't have the charge and the responsibility of the Bureau."

Long kept hammering away. Didn't this performance by the telephone company in permitting, even helping, to tap its own lines raise "a great question of apprehension of your subscribers over the city as to whether their telephones are maybe being tapped or bugged?"

U.S. POST OFFICE
R.

"Sure, it certainly does," Brewster replied.

The telephone company's security man then read into the record a long list of work orders he had approved dealing with the installation of special lines to facilitate the widespread FBI wire tapping.

Senator Long: Did your employees go with the FBI men when they were disguised as telephone company employees?

Brewster: I will put it this way. I think there were some Bureau men who went with the telephone company people.

Senator Long: Disguised as telephone employees?

Brewster: They had on old clothes and those things. I think I loaned one of them a pair of —

Senator Long: Mr. Brewster, this work is so dangerous and so disagreeable to your men that you have to ask for volunteers, don't you, to go out and handle this type of situation?

Brewster: I have never had to.

Senator Long: I think Mr. Schmitt or Mr. [William] Hare [two telephone employees who had previously testified] could answer that question for me. Could either one of you gentlemen answer it for me?

Hare: Yes, sir.

Senator Long: Thank you. It got so dangerous, they finally stopped volunteering.

Brewster: It might have been.

The ethical dilemmas in which a telephone company official becomes involved when he makes the FBI his master were highlighted in a final, farcical exchange between Senator Long and Brewster. Long asked Brewster what happened when telephone subscribers became suspicious and asked the company to determine whether their phones were being tapped. Well, said Brewster, the company sent men out to check poles in the vicinity of the terminal box in question, and twice in the past year, as a matter of fact, they had discovered taps. Then it went like this:

Senator Long: You have found those. What did you do with the equipment that you found?

Brewster: Our instructions to our people are, who actually make the inspection, remove the equipment and give it to the customer and advise them to contact the law enforcing officers, preferably the FBI. (Emphasis added.)

Senator Long: What would you have done if you got a call from the Acme Jobbing Company, I believe you said, down at 2512 McGee Street? [This was one of the locations that Brewster had helped the FBI to tap.] What would you have done if you had gotten a call that their line was being tapped?

Brewster: I don't know, to be frank with you.

Senator Long: Would you have gone down to check it?

Brewster: I just don't know.

This seems like an appropriate note on which to close this account of the world of Big Brother. Freedom can hardly endure, despite all the platitudes of stump-shouting politicians, unless people can feel free to exchange their private thoughts and indulge in uninhibited discussion. And who can feel free in a world in which government employees spy on a sun-bathing wife, snoop through mail, tap telephones, bug the most private areas of the home—and then, if it suits official purposes, take the witness stand and, superior to the law, blithely lie about it? The subterranean world that the Long committee investigation has been exposing is in irreconcilable conflict with the traditions of our past and is incalculably menacing to any continuance of a healthy democracy.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Letting the Tory Dogs Have It

WRITERS AND POLITICS: Essays and Criticism. By Conor Cruise O'Brien.
Pantheon Books. 259 pp. $4.95.

Warren Miller

Richard Ellmann begins his biography of Joyce by noting that to the English he is "eccentric and 'Irish,' " and points out that this sort of remark is "dangerously 'English.' " Ellmann's warning must be taken seriously: too often we begin by defining others and end by revealing only ourselves, and what is revealed is almost never attractive. Our response, thus far, to Dr. O'Brien's books—To Katanga and Back and now this collection of essays—reveals us as a willfully ignorant people who aspire at most to a kind of peasant cunning. This is only at first glance in contradiction to our scientific achievement; it is even, possibly, one of the results of that achievement: our mastery of the atom and superiority in weaponry has produced a need for ignorance in certain areas; and where we least want enlightenment is in that most vital of areas, the cold war. Knowledge would almost certainly lead to a demand for change; this would require an admission of past error; and those now in power are not ready for that. Mr. Johnson's face is certainly made of rubber and his feet are certainly made of clay; he cannot help revealing the first and is probably therefore all the more sensitive about revealing the second.

Some lessons of history, however, are writ so large that even a people as hopeful as we are cannot rewrite them. It is well known, for example, that empires fall. No possible stickum can therefore be overlooked. If ignorance will keep the machine going a little while longer, then ignorant we will be: Every eye closed for the Greater Good, men! It would be nice to think that our enormous difficulty in facing facts (we've only just begun to hear about facing theories) is not cowardice at all but perhaps a saving sense of shame. Whichever it may be, the result, for the present, is the same: given the choice between Hammarskjold's diplomatic mysticism and O'Brien's salutary compulsion for truth telling, we choose to embrace the mystic. Markings, so sadly wanting, so unsubstantial, floats to the top of the bestseller lists, while Writers and Politics is greeted with silence, shunted toward the back pages of fat book supplements, or received with a weary here-we-go-again tone, as if the woods were full of O'Briens and books like this were published every day of the week.

"Only reality is admirable," Renan wrote, in the not unlikely year of 1848; and this is, in part, what Dr. O'Brien would have us understand, even when, as he wrote in To Katanga and Back, reality may "often puzzle or disappoint, and may occasionally scandalize, those who agree most warmly with its political conclusions. Personally, I regret this, being temperamentally not much inclined to 'letting the Tory dogs have the best of it,' even momentarily."

It's difficult to imagine the Tory dogs finding any comfort here; they may applaud O'Brien's description of Adlai Stevenson's face—"its shiftily earnest advocate's expression"—but they will at once be alarmed by his assertion that it is "the ingratiating moral mask which a toughly acquisitive society wears before the world it robs: 'liberalism' is the ideology of the rich, the elevation into universal values of the codes which favoured the emergence, and favour the continuance, of capitalist society." And: "Liberal values . . . today make the rich world yawn and the poor world sick," is a statement calculated to outrage Max Lerner and Prof. Roche; and while it may amuse Mr. Buckley (for its style), he will not make the mistake of assuming O'Brien is on his side.

This is one of O'Brien's great virtues: where he stands is never in doubt although his position is not a simple stance, not what journalists have taken to calling a posture. O'Brien is a Socialist who is also "a liberal, incurably. . . . The revolutionary idea both impressed me and struck me as more immediately relevant for most of humanity than were the liberal concepts"; but it is these concepts and their "long-term importance" that hold O'Brien's allegiance.

Are we then witnessing the too familiar spectacle of the self-declared radical announcing himself ready to take tea at the White House and join ADA? Are Lerner and Roche already approaching with comradely greetings? Like most liberals they are capable, of course, of enormous self-deceptions, but I suspect that mythomania and empire building will not carry them so far as to try to annex O'Brien. What divides them irrevocably is not only O'Brien's commitment to socialism; there is also the fact, equally important, that he sees his liberalism deriving from 1848; it is, he points out, a tradition which in "Catholic and time-lagging countries" gets "less lip-service" and is taken more seriously than in countries like our own.

It is this combination then of Socialist vision and an old-world, time-lagging dedication to truth—and to irony, which intellectuals in a "priest-led society" (and in other societies too, I would add) "set great store by"—which gives this book its marvelous instructive power. A slim volume, a Little Anthology of quotes could easily be drawn from it; this would serve not merely to delight (although that would be no small matter) but as an explication of O'Brien and his altogether admirable reality.

Such a volume could very well begin with this on Dwight Macdonald as New Yorker critic:

> He . . . in the political apathy, or aphasia, which seems to have overcome him on losing his Trotskyite faith, has been visited by an illusion of social and economic weightlessness, believing himself to be outside the system which he is describing, and of which he is, apparently without knowing it, a functioning part.

and continue with this from an essay on Orwell:

> Some of Orwell's American admirers in the fifties may have been, in reality, more impressed by the arguments of Senator McCarthy than by those of Animal Farm, but an Orwellian conversion lent dignity to retreat.

or this from an essay on Michelet:

> The plain dry style [of modern historians] implies the acceptance of rigorous standards, submission to ascertainable facts, the aspiration of historiography toward the status of an exact science. Yet, as in all systems of strict convention, hypocrisy, the nemesis of puritanism, is never far behind.

and on Sartre:

> A writer's integrity, in political matters, does not necessarily vary directly with the square of his distance from the Communist Party.

From The New Yorker to Michelet to Sartre, and yet we have come nowhere near indicating the remarkable variety of O'Brien's book. There is still the section on Ireland: "Irishness is not primarily a question of birth or blood or language: it is the condition of being involved in the Irish situation, and usually of being mauled by it." The selection on literary critics: "What we easily fail to see is that the 'non-political' Western critic resembles his Soviet rather than his Polish colleagues by the way in which he acquiesces in the orthodoxy which prevails in his society." And the cold war: ". . . what Encounter means when it says that it loves liberty is merely that it hates communism." And a final section on the UN and the developing countries: ". . . considering the past history, and much of the present practise, of white peoples . . . it might be well for Europeans and Americans, having rescued [in the Congo] some hundreds of whites from blacks, now to set about rescuing several millions of blacks from whites."

I think it can be seen that Dr. O'Brien is, in a sense, engaged in a "rescue mission" which is by no means confined to the borders of the Congo; like Rilke it is this sweet apple world he wants to save, nothing less; such messianic madness is the chief sanity our time allows. The liberation of the worlds of the East and the West and the poor world, Dr. O'Brien tells us, will proceed from within and will depend mainly on > mighty economic and social forces, but also a little on the efforts of individuals. From the other side we hear a few writers . . . busily chipping away. Our applause can neither encourage nor help them. What might help would be that, from our own side also, should be heard the sound of chipping.

It is a claustrophobic image, and every American writer since Poe will find it familiar to the point of being downright homey: it has been for years our place. What O'Brien is doing is to show writers how to make that daily descent to the pit meaningful. Chipping away, slowly, painfully, in the worst possible conditions, nevertheless we will yet come to liberation and what lies beyond it.

When we do, and even well before, Writers and Politics will have become one of those underground (images of mining persist) books which slowly become a determining influence. The silence which marked its arrival should not be surprising: silence is always the response of those who are, as Galileo said, willfully blind; it is what issues from them when alarming things are happening: when the earth shifts, climates modify and vocabularies begin to change.

Max Kozloff

SEURAT. By John Russell. Frederick A. Praeger. 286 pp. 176 black-and-white illus., 48 color. $7.50. Paper $3.95.

There has been a great deal of Seurat research recently, and a continued, even heightened regard for his work. John Russell, riding the crest of this interest in one of the immense geniuses of modern painting, finds his way nimbly and responsibly. This is not to say that his book offers anything greatly original. Its virtue, rather, is that it makes readable a considerable amount of previous specialized and technical study without becoming superficial in the process.

Still, one finds peculiar omissions and emphases. As if it were an old chestnut by now (which in a way it is), Russell is quite perfunctory about Seurat's relation to Impressionism, and the complex implications, if not the actual execution, of his color mechanics. It is not quite clear in Russell's text how Seurat "geometrized" space by color (as distinct from his strictly compositional devices). Nor are its Symbolist, constructive and optical tensions interrelated, as they might be viewed by a spectator. He sees the "Grand Jatte" fairly enough as the "heir to one of the great poetic traditions of European painting," but does not convince by his citation of a 15th-century Italian allegory as one of its sources. On the other hand, it is refreshing to be shown Seurat's affinities, especially in "Parade," with Rimbaud. As to the potential social criticism in Seurat, it is a moot point, but stimulating to think about.

Nevertheless, the main story, illustrated generously with so-so color, is here. It reveals a career that moves conceptually from a material reality to a "superior" reality (surreality?), from fugitive sensation into a definitive synthesis, and from impersonal method to a lyrically personal expression. These turns are caught neatly as they build up an oeuvre that has indebted Picasso, Kandinsky, Mondrian, Duchamp, Delaunay, Klee and, with unforeseen consequences, Max Ernst. If the text occasionally reads like a slide lecture, it is always well oiled and to the point. Russell is a cultural journalist of a high order.

ODILON REDON. By Klaus Berger. Translated from the German by Michael Bullock. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 244 pp. 90 black-and-white illus., 20 color. $19.95.

Redon was a fantasist whose work not so much impinged upon the fin de siècle, as it drew a delicate, timorous nourishment from it. He means more to us than the smoky Fauré and Maeterlinck, spirits kindred to him in the sister arts of music and literature, because his work contains an incipient abstraction, and an intuition of horror in the exquisiteness of sense itself. With sinister refinement, he contributed to a pictorial shift from the accent on the objects of knowledge to the processes of knowing. And yet "knowing" was always necessarily out of reach. It reminds one of what Alan

Watts had to say in another context: "Consciousness peers out of a center which it cannot see. . . . Life seems to resolve itself down to a tiny germ or nipple of sensitivity . . . a squiggling little nucleus that is trying to make love to itself and can never quite get there." Redon gives the impression of wanting to see more intensely, come what may, by closing his eyes. No one has made more vivid the emotion of unrequited tenderness.

Klaus Berger has written an unforgivable book on this artist. It wanders in awkward ebullience (translated from the German), through patchy sections on such subjects as "spiritualized nature," and "inspiration." A hash is made of Redon's development, pictures are inconveniently placed, and the catalogue cancels its usefulness by being without illustration! (Not that compiling a Redon catalogue isn't enormously difficult: inevitably vague subject headings, problematical dating, and a dispersed prodigality of works.) Much worse, the overall approach of the essay is obtuse. Berger scants the fascinating iconographical vibrations in Redon without having developed a stylistic vocabulary worth taking seriously. He hates abstract art, and makes howling historical mistakes (e. g., "even when Cézanne had long won world fame, Seurat was still in obscurity, almost unknown"). Contrary to evidence, he at one point speaks of the flatness of Redon's style (its atmospheric depth—as distinct from modulated values—was its least progressive feature); and of the late works, Berger remarks erroneously of an "objective color that is firmly based on construction." Intermittently, at least, he breaks through to the self-evident. The color plates are beautiful.

THE HISTORY OF SURREALISM. By Maurice Nadeau. Translated from the French by Richard Howard, with an introduction by Roger Shattuck. The Macmillan Co. 351 pp. $6.95.

SURREALISM. By Patrick Waldberg. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 127 pp. 144 black-and-white illus., 8 color. $6.95.

AN INTRODUCTION TO SURREALISM. By J. H. Matthews. Pennsylvania State University Press. 192 pp. $5.

Writings on Surrealism almost always turn out to be unsatisfactory. Several reasons for this disappointing performance suggest themselves. One is that the Surrealist sensibility—it is hard to call it a movement or a style—still breathes. It more or less subtly pervades, or is a nuance within, all lively art today, so that efforts to see it as of the historical past are completely premature. To be sure, the age of manifestoes is over; political scandals, or attempts at scandal, they have faded away. Their animus, Surrealism, has sometimes been viewed as a 20th-century inheritor of romanticism. But if a generation of Manet could look back upon that of 1830 as finished, we must see the example of Breton as only, in a disturbing sense, reborn. The writers of the current volumes remain in various ways captives of (rather than participants in) the Surrealist past, without at all glimpsing its potentialities in the present. Not seeing or caring about the dialogue of contemporary art with Surrealism, they have shortchanged their own interests. In each of their books, there is a vacancy at the center.

Another reason why good accounts of the subject are hard to come by is its very antagonism to coherent discussion. Not merely is it the most bewilderingly interdisciplinary phenomenon, it is also one of the most self-obfuscating. One learns to take artists and writers with some skepticism when they talk of their work; in their social heyday, the Surrealists demanded unquestioning allegiance to the deliberately implausible or ostentatiously woolly. The present writers react a little nervously to this put-on. Their dilemma consists of recounting a faith to which they are very sympathetic, but which is also a little too outdated, a little too extravagant to uphold. They are as convincing and as well intentioned in their picture of Surrealism, as are Reform Jews in the practice of their religion. Yet Aragon, Ernst, Artaud and Bunuel were at all times impious (or piously heretic) men.

The attitude toward them here is uncritical and middle class, but tinged with uneasiness. Despite their lip service to its continuity, Nadeau and Waldberg are disposed to see Surrealism lifelessly as a collection of impulsive slogans and madcap personalities that never precipitated an art controversial enough to be discussed on its own terms. It is the fashion to analyze Surrealism, like Expressionism, as a mesh of social gestures, and as an aberrant if revolutionary ambience. The protagonists of that ethos have themselves encouraged this treatment by denouncing art, de-emphasizing talent and reviling productivity. These books do not necessarily accept such statements at their face value, but they do confine themselves to doci menting them, and hence to tamin Surrealism by inadvertence.

Maurice Nadeau's The History (Surrealism was first published in 194 and remained, faute de mieux, th standard review of the subject. No it is finally translated into Englis (by Richard Howard), together wit a 1957 epilogue (somewhat dyspeptic and a sampling of Surrealist literar tidbits and sweetmeats. It is organize chronologically in chapters that de tail the behavioral tics and polemic oppositions of the major and a grou of minor actors. One thing that emer ges from the liberal samplings of text is that Surrealism's "automatistic" us of language is not anywhere near a radical as it made itself out to b Breton's seizure of an idea that cam to him in a half-drowsy state, an "tapped on the window," was ampl fied only into a more contemporar echo of 17th-century French linguisti sonority. If the poetry that followe was frequently studded with startlin images, it still abused and degrade word meanings in a traditional Frenc vein of phrase mongering. It fact, is possible to see Surrealist bomba as an attempt to correct a chroni cultural hyberbole by its own method In these pages, it is Louis Aragon wh most often calls the bluff of the Su realist "worshippers of impasse" (N deau), he says: "Kill yourself or don' But don't drag your slugs of agony a over the world . . . don't leave that r volver butt hanging out of your poc et any longer, irresistibly tempting good kick in the ass. Don't insult th true suicide by this perpetual pan ing. . . ." Perhaps in its occasional rai lery against its own narcissism, "th perpetual panting," Surrealism come closest in evoking a relevant predic ment. From Nadeau, one gets the mo authentic glimpse of a consciousne that gains knowledge only to abort i self. Possibly that is his major contr bution.

Patrick Waldberg emerged i the thirties as a friend of Max Erns He has produced a quite sloppy, er gaging little book, sprinkled with Su realist family-album shots, which a pires far more to be an addendum tha a replacement to Marcel Jean's Hi tory of Surrealist Painting. After promising start in which the autho makes the distinction between the "en blematics" and the "naturalists of th imaginary" in Surrealist painting, hi essay wanders in disjointed quote anecdotes and puffs. But it is piquar to read that "Tanguy captured spider which he ate alive to terrify the neighborhood"; and, even more, instructive to study a Belgian Surrealist map of the world (1929), in which New Guinea is larger than India, France and the United States do not exist, and Easter Island vies with a South America shrunk to Peru. In addition, there is a photographic gallery of poker-faced but self-infatuated individuals that conveys a sense of superannuated fun. Here is a Holmes-Watson tableau of Duchamp and Man Ray; and here also is Ray's incredibly sensuous photograph of the beautiful Meret Oppenheim, authoress of the fur-lined teacup. It alone is worth the price of admission.

The Matthews study (he is an English scholar) is academic in the unfortunate sense of the word. He paws around the central concepts of Surrealism, but does not bring to them the quality of mind—or perhaps incredulity—that will test them for their value as well as for their defects. Just the same, he presents the only survey into which one's intellectual teeth can at least sink. For example, he takes pains to show how art criticism has always been at odds with Surrealist dogma, because the Surrealist quality—that is, the irrational, the inexplicable—usurps in their program any merely aesthetic considerations. André Masson is quoted about "a desperate breach between the content and the container" in the easel tradition, a breach that criticism has shown time and again not to exist. Although the Surrealists frequently spoke about "getting beyond painting," they just as often admitted having to settle for it. The fallacy lies in supposing that their work at its best would be dishonored by form, or that it has expunged form. And precisely at the point where it would be valuable to discuss the compromise between vision and syntax in Surrealist art (e. g., the conventions proposed), Matthews leaves off. It would, after all, have required seeing intentions and operations underlying those merely announced.

Similarly, his treatment of the collective vision of Surrealism gets into immediate trouble on a complex issue. It is not necessary at this late date to point out that there exists an alarming interior life in everyone's psyche, whose tapping provides the Surrealist's credentials. Nor does one have to argue in 1965 that the probing of dreams does not imply an escapist premise. In these matters, there is no escape from life, and no irrelevance to thought. But when the Surrealists maintain that they picture disturbances, or find irritations (what a difference between them) in the human unconscious, it is important to elicit what is unique or individual in their fantasies, not what is common to ours. Why should we grant them a simple-minded banality when, upon respectably numerous occasions, they don't deserve it? For the rest, Matthews looks into such matters as techniques of chance, theories of enchantment and Surrealist erotomania, but from a generally static and repetitious position. The book is misnamed: it is really an introduction to an introduction.

Now, no battles of the kind that faced its initiators have to be fought by the Surrealist sensibility. The shibboleths rejected (logical structures, perceptual painting, idealist philosophy, etc.), and the gods worshiped (Lautréamont, Moreau, Sade, et al.) no longer have their old resonance. But the Dada principle of displacement, and the Surrealist technique of incongruous juxtaposition hold sway over visual art as they never did before. What is Surrealist in Pop art is the hallucinating pornographic tone with which it considers its images; what is contemporary in happenings is their sensitivity to urban chaos and madness. In fact, the current environment is so monstrous and implausible (in its political as well as its aesthetic dimensions) as to surpass the original Surrealists' wildest dreams. It allows the contemporary artists a far more abstract and chilly temper than their predecessors. What the overall theme now needs is the attention of a scrupulous art historian, conscious of what has happened all around him for the last ten years, and willing to defrock himself a little by an infusion of the critical spirit. The resulting indiscretion ought to be valuable.

CANVASES AND CAREERS. By Harrison C. White and Cynthia A. White. John Wiley & Sons. 167 pp. $5.50.

THE BRIDE AND THE BACHELORS. By Calvin Tomkins. Viking Press. 246 pp. $6.50.

Although widely disparate in their subject matter, the works listed above pose some related questions, especially in the realm of methodology. The overall issue might be summarized as follows: can the techniques of sociology and psychology bear relevant fruit when applied to the history of visual art? What criteria might be employed, and what areas might be opened up for illumination? As demonstrated here, the answers to these queries make an interesting spectacle, not least of all because the objectivity of social-science research steers a collision course with the value-oriented criticism that is most associated with the field of art.

The Whites take as their inquiry the study of institutional change in 19th-century French artistic life, and the pressures and forces which shaped careers within it. Mr. White is the author of an earlier book entitled An Anatomy of Kinship: Mathematical Models for Structures of Cumulated Roles. The current effort is punctuated by stupefying tables such as "Changing Sponsors for Showings of Manet's Paintings, by Decade of Production, for Three Periods of His Career." One of the authors' more astounding findings is that by conservative estimate 200,000 salable canvases were produced on the average in France every ten years from 1850 to 1900. Curiously enough, this figure is the key to a rather deft little analysis based on materials that have never been brought together with quite so specific a purpose. For the sheer quantity of artistic production allows the authors to see the unmaking of institutional stability.

They start by showing the conflicts between the old painters' guilds and the court aesthetes, eager for greater prestige and aristocratic patronage From the victory of the latter arose the academic system. Dominating the first three-quarters of the last century the Institut provided a competitive sequence of career opportunities, organization of exhibition, professional communication, and control of awards and rejections. But it was also overcentralized and overloaded. It could not maintain teaching standards, reform the Salon (and the jury system), and channel commissions to the more than 3,000 practitioners. By mid-century the new dealer-critic system was making forays against these unsatisfactory conditions by offering more flexible and frequent shows (including the effective group exhibition), and more personal, committed and focused publicity: both more meaningful than official honors. Additionally, it made available to the rising middle-class public the more intimate and portable pictures of an avant-garde in opposition to the history painting of an earlier epoch. In passing, the authors make some interesting remarks. They see, for instance, a possible correlation between petit-bourgeois frugality in the artists' own background and Bohemian austerity. They point out the evils of a speculative market as an incentive and fault of the new system. And they see the social and emotional content of gallery patronage as in some ways more related to the guilds than to the bureaucratic structure which it replaced.

On the debit side, however, a number of problems are left unanswered. The use of the word "pure" art—signifying the painting of philosophical aspiration on one hand, and the more decorative work of the Impressionists on the other—is much more confused than it ought to be. Then too, the overarching fact that the academic establishment ceased to represent any of the real developments in French painting after 1835 is shunted to a sideline it should never occupy. Collecting patterns and the larger economic situation do not cause institutional change; they only reflect it. The Whites are quite right to see the critic-dealer system as giving a new social framework to the artist, instead of being a symptom of his alienation, but they undervalue the triumph of an individuality which was bound to create a cleavage between the overall cultural temper and creative vision. Above all, vast quantities of artists were not so causative nor fluent a factor in the historical matrix as is

Chert — the word resists poetry as flint
Compels it. Flint and chert are cousins. It would be easier
If chert were called — oh — obsidian
Or granite or any name that does not sound
Like a noisome weed, the cry of a mangy bird,
A scruffy pander of indeterminate sex,
An urban blasphemy. But there it is,
And there chert is, as beautiful as arrowheads,
As there-it-is and as there-it-was
As beautiful creation. It is quartz.
Quartz conducts. Put it to your cheek
And it is cool even when summer flames.
It is part chalcedony and chalcedony is Carnelian, chrysoprase, agate, onyx—these Glamourous and illustrious relatives bow,
And cheek-cool quartz chert, the street child,
Suddenly is dear for an honest-seeming
Name of cheekiness and blasphemy.
Beneath chert, in the dictionary, is cherte,
Meaning tenderness, dearness, dearth, and cheerfulness.
Obsolete. How could one word mean all this?
A chert, pert, cheek-cool, quartz word could,
One enduring dearth, one dear and tender,
And still cheerful. Cheek-cool cheerful quartz —
Chert — in the gaiety of a city dialect,
A kind of Venetian, smart to states and sand.
The latter took longer — of rock pressures we know nothing.
We prefer to discourse about the resulting Qualities: quartz courage, carnelian honor, Chrysoprase ceremonial, loyalties of chalcedony, onyx
Faith, agate strength, flint adversity.
But to come through pressures cheerfully — this suggests
The quiet virtues, kindness and cheerfulness, easy
Perhaps as street blasphemies. Quartz conducts;
The quiet virtues lead. I like to see pieces
Of chert on my desk, for themselves and as reminder.

implied by a statistical approach. By overlooking the advent of unprecedented artistic "movements" and the effects of the intellectual little magazines (incommensurable, but both potent), the book misrepresents the actual turning points of its subject.

Besides, the unjuried Salon des Indépendants, which started in the eighties, and all the successive Parisian phenomena — the Salon d'Automne, and Salon de Mai, right down to the Biennales and exhibitions of dentists' wives—repeat even larger inundations of mediocrity than in the dynastic past. But now the organs of power and the decisive opinions have fled far from government sponsorship, to become an establishment in their own right.

Confusion about this new establishment runs like a leitmotiv through Rosenberg and Fliegel's The Vanguard Artist: a confusion of American contemporary artists about their role, their audience and their success. The "vanguard" artist is seen to have inherited a situation in which—the Philistines finally vanquished—he is accepted implausibly at face value. A breakdown of the century-long resistance to advanced art, at least on the social level, plunges him into breast beating and self-contradiction. Such are the reiterations of a book which comprises "in depth," "informal," anonymous interviews with twenty-five prominent New York artists (Abstract Expressionists, mostly), distributed in fragments through chapters with such headings as "Generational Conflict," "The Artist and His Publics," "Museums and Dealers," etc. One author is a professor of sociology, the other is a psychotherapist. By the time their interviews were completed in 1962, they had compiled a list of complaints in which artists let off steam about the chaos of accelerated novelty, the vulgarity and commercialism of the scene and, concerning the younger generation—Pop artists just making their entrance—resentment galore.

In point of fact, these artists are the tail end of an era in which it was still possible to see themselves as nobly separated from society; in which, if they had to function in dehumanized circumstances, their own human ambition as artists carried proportionately more weight. Their self-image as visionaries and as upholders of tradition, for the time being, was more important than their hard-won professional status. How like the early Salon academics they were in this respect. Yet, immediately following upon them, and taken up with a bewildering enthusiasm, were new men who not merely displaced them from the market but who were impervious to fame, and restricted in their outlook (generally presuming to be no more than specialists). In both cases, the social orientation is bourgeois (so was the Impressionists') but the older artists are far more equivocal in their class identity, and far more sensitive about the emoluments which have taken the edge off their "vanguard" position. Paradoxically, the "establishment" no longer exists as a locatable agency: it is everywhere and nowhere. Patronage and recognition can come from any place, in random, impersonal formats which actually generate the greatest affront and bewilderment.

So much for the description of a state of affairs that has become rather familiar to interested spectators. But it never occurred to the authors to put it into context. If they outline the centralization of New York as world art nucleus (replacing 19th-century Paris), they do not understand that the real objection of their subjects to Pop art is its stylistic critique of their own conception of art. Social behavior, financial competition, while obviously threatening, are in the end subsidiary to the ideological offense. Worse still, the bull-session quotations are used only to contradict one another in a moil of erratic opinion. Quarrelsome artists are proved to be very much like other anti-bureaucratic people, when caught off guard, or removed from their work, and this is hardly a revelation. Moreover, that their candor is nameless reduces its possible historical value. Finally, the conceptual questions, those that would really distinguish these artists as the creators they may be, are beyond the cultural power of their interlocutors to ask. They give us no further insight than what we are already beginning to see reflected superficially in the mass media. In fact, the book itself is a disguised example of those media, putting on sociological airs.

The Tomkins book, for its part, shows not the slightest hesitation in revealing its journalistic origins. As a vehicle for information and evaluation about artists of the caliber of Duchamp and Rauschenberg (Tinguely and Cage are also treated), the New Yorker profile is a very curious specimen indeed. Being a champion of WASP taste, notorious for the tepidness with which it receives anything vital in the arts, the magazine here imposes a shockingly casual accent on the biographies of some rather subversive individuals. And yet, even if delivered in Tomkins' imitable teatime tone, there is a mass of new material here that any scholar or critic would welcome. (Although the Duchamp piece repeats what is generally known in a famous career.) Making no distinction between the momentous and the trivial—both are grist to his reportorial typewriter — Tomkins divorces himself from his subjects. Ironically, when he brings out Tinguely's rabid "je m'en foutisme," he is only echoing an extreme version of his own ethical non-engagement.

As is proper, Duchamp dominates the proceedings. A cautionary note appears in the master's disdain for commercialism, and one of the major themes of this book is the conviction of its protagonists that life is more important than art, sensibility more important than sales. Fed into Surrealism by Duchamp pre-eminently, this belief has insinuated itself in a far more ambiguous fashion among young artists—Johns is one—who have been able to function in the limelight without losing their direction. The presence of Duchamp's anti-professional stance in Rauschenberg's sensuously rich production is an extraordinary phenomenon. In a sense, if you understand that "society just takes what it wants," this can be a liberation far more than

> We might say that the wooing of this infinitely seductive Bride can never wholly succeed. The Bachelors may expend all their art in the attempt . . . and the Bride may further their efforts with her own quickening desire to be possessed. But this Bride, like life itself, can never be truly possessed. . . .

Even in Rauschenberg's "Monogram," an angora goat with a tire around its midriff, the horns and platform are smeared with paint: an intimation of aesthetic enjoyment that has either to be humiliated or displaced in order that its value be still maintained. It is the Symbolist longing for a pure, unattainable pleasure, in a new guise. How the outer world still tends to respond to this is indicated by the story of the lady at the Jewish Museum who wondered why Rauschenberg was interested only in ugly things.

> I told her [says the artist] that if I were to describe the way she was dressed, it might sound very much like what she'd been saying. For instance, she had feathers on her head. And she had this enamel brooch with a picture of "The Blue Boy" on it pinned to her breast. And around her neck she had on what she would call mink but what could also be described as the skin of a dead animal.

Artists can make the most amazing discoveries by the change of an attitude. But to explore those discoveries, something more is needed than the wan efforts of statisticians, sociologues and journalists.

INADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE

Several English critics whom I respect were less than lukewarm about Albee's Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? but rapturous about John Osborne's Inadmissible Evidence (Belasco). I point this out not as a comment on the plays or on the critics, but to emphasize that art and literature are not inevitably international in value. Critics are parts of a community each with its own particular history and need. Inadmissible Evidence was a great popular as well as critical success in London; it has not been well received here and is probably destined to a brief run.

There is still a "dream" in Virginia Woolf, as well as a jocularity, which helps keep the play's sting from being poisonous. Though Inadmissible Evidence begins with and occasionally reverts to stream of consciousness monologue, it contains no "dream"; though it crackles with sharp phrases which startle us to a guffaw, it is not at all humorous. It is a display of English nausea.

The absence of a dream is its underlying theme. Where in our lives is there anything to rouse us to significant action, to some sort of substantial idealism, to a belief or a cause which might lead us to a struggle worth the candle? In fact, says Maitland, the man who submits evidence against himself, "I've never discovered what is [worth the candle]." Everything has gone stale, flat, acidulous.

The English see in Maitland a "hero" of their day, the present archetyp of the educated middle-class Britisher He works hard without a sense o purpose. He has little except a routin relationship to his job. He has only nagging affection for his wife, a nervous yearning for his mistress, a spastic impulse toward every pretty gir he encounters and with whom he copulates in a fog of befuddlement. Hi children are slightly repellent strangers. One of the most eloquent, indee brilliantly written, speeches in th play is Maitland's denunciation of th "cool" generation, addressed to hi daughter about whose age he is i some doubt. He is addicted to pills. solicitor, he is losing his professiona grip. He sees all his clients as on dismal, distracted creature no bette off than himself. "I, myself, am mor packed with spite and twitching wit revenge than anyone I know of. I actually often, frequently, daily want see people die for their errors. I wis to kill them myself, to throw th switch with my own fist." The ma spews spleen.

Jimmy Porter in Look Back i Anger was bitter about England aft the war. It had lost its ancient statur Now says Maitland, "I'm not the or on any side. I don't have any idea where I am." Even more to the poi he exclaims: "Britain's position in th world. Screw that. What about my position!" Because there has been th apparent change from a degree of s cial consciousness in Jimmy Porter Maitland's despair about himself, has been said by a number of Englis and at least one American critic th Inadmissible Evidence is the profounder, the more universal play—a moder tragedy.

No doubt many Englishmen s themselves in Maitland. They hon Osborne for articulating their inn distress. (Outwardly—and this is o of Osborne's beefs—they are much t patient.) He exposes their conceal wounds, their soul-sickness. His pla is a document: it does reveal the weariness, their atony, above all the desire to sneer at themselves. In th together with an extraordinary facul for derision in passages of coruscati rhetoric, lies the strength of Osborne play.

Still, it is a social sympto It is not true that Maitland embodi the condition of man. At the most is an Englishman, and only of o sort. To be sure he has his counte parts in other countries—but with d tinct differences. Even the morally d bilitated American has more youthf zest and thus a semblance of hope, going somewhere, getting some place. There are large areas of the world in which the Maitlands hardly exist at all. They are the product of political stagnation brought on not by fear or an intellectual incapacity to change but by a society divided within itself: one part clinging to a traditional past which has become a fading memory, the other unsettled because it does not know what the future will look like. Maitland is an image of a festering England.

I say "image" because Maitland is not a man at all. He exists as an idea, not as a person. He is a composite of observations, reflections, confessional epigrams. He is the spirit that denies itself. The man who supposes himself a Maitland deceives himself. Maitland is a collage of traits and effects adding up to a gigantic grimace. He is truth only as a caricature is truth. The material of Inadmissible Evidence might prove far more cogent as a series of sketches, pathetic-comic.

There is talent in the enterprise, but not for tragedy or great drama. Apart from the unmistakable literary flair, it is a talent for catching the mood of a period, a sense of what is in the air, the gift of the adman of genius. This is coupled by what is deepest in Osborne: an outraged disaffection, a self-loathing projected as a contempt for society. None of this is irreconcilable with an irrepressible ambition.

I admire the phenomenon; I have a sneaking sympathy with it, and for all the above reasons (not excepting my own admiration) I find it hateful. It is anti-biologic. Men have a life wish far more potent than any death wish. It is the life wish which must be perceived and made sensible to us in every work of art no matter how "black." It is the quickening spark which creates whatever is real and meaningful to us in the world—including expressions of anguish. Ultimately no true work of art can be a depressant. The "downbeat" is only an outcry, sometimes a howl of affirmation.

There is too little of this in Inadmissible Evidence. There is barely a trace of compassion (or passion of any kind) in the play. Everything hangs fire. Actually there is no situation, only a state of mind. Therefore nothing can move or be moving. Maitland's clients are not convinced of their case: they are undecided as to whether or not they demand judgment. Maitland's last words as he remains alone in his office are, "I think I'll just stay here. Good-bye." He does not want to become other than he is. His psychologic posture is to sit contemplating a supposedly injured thumb murmuring, "A little tumor. On the end of another." For the English audience Inadmissible Evidence became a formidably impressive piece of publicity, reading: Sign of the Times. In this it succeeds too well.

Anthony Page's direction is excellent; the cast on the whole is very good. This is especially so, among the lesser parts, of Ted van Griethuysen as a "symbolic" homosexual—latent in almost every aspect of thought, work, play or misdeed.

Nicol Williamson's performance as Maitland is a technical triumph. The part is exhausting because Inadmissible Evidence is virtually an overextended one-man show. What is especially remarkable about Williamson's performance is that he forces one to listen to and to hear every phrase of the 2- and 3-page speeches. Not a line or a nuance is scotched or dropped. Still, from this appearance alone, one is unable to assess Williamson's full measure as an actor. At times he is as intolerable as the character he portrays—nasal in speech with a ringing, uninflected voice except to the extent to which he is able to make such an utterance as "How are you?" an oily snarl of disgust. There is in the performance a kind of unvarying proficiency of delivery which may be required by the assignment, or intended to maintain the style of heartlessness which is perhaps desired by author and director. Feeling seems largely absent, or perhaps it has been avoided as evidence of sloppy sentimentality.

To extend both the range and selectivity of this annual listing, the "Records of the Year" have been restricted to those conjunctions of performances and works that would constitute major musical events in any context. Following this, however, a number of other recordings released during 1965 that make worth-while, if somewhat more limited, contributions to the recorded literature are listed according to their aspect of greatest interest: as adequate performances of important literature previously unavailable or inadequately represented on records; as responsible performances of frequently performed literature; or as reissues of historic performances. Dates in parentheses refer to Nation issues in which relevant discussions have appeared; records not previously reviewed will be discussed in forthcoming issues.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Dear Sirs: William Ryan's article "Savage Discovery: The Moynihan Report" [The Nation, Nov. 22] . . . is credible because of his extensive training in the fields of psychiatry and community relations. Unlike many journalists, he does not merely gobble up governmental reports blindly. Unlike many publishers, your magazine does not use contributors merely because they have a degree from a school of journalism or because their views coincide with the country's dominant political demeanor. Both Mr. Ryan and you deserve praise for presenting an article which questions the abuse of social research methodology.

William D. Cabin
Editor, The Pitt News
University of Pittsburgh

New York City

Dear Sirs: For the sake of discussion, one should, I suppose, assume that William Ryan actually read "The Moynihan Report" before writing his article. But if he did, the only charitable thing to say of his article is that he was so intent on making a "Savage Discovery" of his own that he manages to distort its import beyond all recognition.

He claims that the report "encourages (no doubt unintentionally) a new form of subtle racism." Since Dr. Ryan lays such a stress on hard data, one would like to know just what evidence he has for this statement. He claims that the report "seduces the reader into believing it is not racism and discrimination but the weaknesses and defects of the Negro himself that account for the present status of inequality between Negro and white." There is not a word in the report which would support this kind of conclusion; the report makes perfectly clear that the pathology of the Negro family stems directly from racism and discrimination, both in the past and present.

Dr. Ryan also claims that the report "allows the reader to make the cause-and-effect connection on the basis of his own prejudice. Little or no actual cause-and-effect data is presented." This kind of statement reminds one of the line taken by cigarette manufacturers: no one has proved that cigarettes cause lung cancer, only that there is a correlation between smoking and lung cancer. . . . Finally, Dr. Ryan claims that the report "singles out the 'unstable Negro family' as the cause of Negro inequality." The report does nothing of the kind. Its point is just the opposite: Negro inequality is the cause of the unstable Negro family.

Dr. Ryan is worried that we will persist "in creating a new set of myths to justify the status quo." I wish he was equally worried about the possibility that social scientists like himself will persist in hanging on to an old set of myths. His old myth, I would suggest, is that if we put an end to discrimination, everything else will more or less take care of itself. To be sure, he mentions the possibility of lingering damage, but he does not see that unless this damage is repaired while discrimination is being ended, the Negro may simply continue to be a victim indefinitely. . . .

Daniel Callahan
Commonweal

Boston, Mass.

Dear Sirs: May I urge, first, that Mr. Callahan and others, give up this boring and childish ritual of beginning with peevish questions about whether the other guy read the book? Why the hell would I—or anyone—go to the trouble of writing an article about an unread document? Now, briefly, to some of the substance:

1. Does the Moynihan Report encourage racism? It does so by giving ammunition to biased people. See Theodore White's Harlem Riot chapter, with its offensive discussion of "biological anarchy" and "zoological tenements" in Negro slums — drawn, obviously, from the report. See Holmes Alexander's discussions of the report, particularly his October 11 syndicated column, where he talks about "family structures that resemble harems more than marriages." Further references on request.

(Parenthetically, in response to other criticism, I have no reason to consider Dr. Moynihan himself any variety of racist or to doubt the compassionate nature of his intention. In this connection, I refer the reader to Moynihan's articles in the current Daedalus and in America, Sept. 18, as probably a more accurate statement of his own position.)

2. Does the report point to family instability as a cause of inequality? If it doesn't then others, as well as I, have misread. See, for example, Mr. Callahan's own magazine, Commonweal of Oct. 15, in which Herbert Gans summarized "the two major themes of the report, that Negroes must be given real equality, and that, because of the deterioration of the family, they are presently incapable of achieving it."

3. Do I try to "explain away uncom-

hhouls, Ghosts and the GOP

Girding itself for 1966, the GOP is faced with two sues—one internal (the John Birch Society), one ternal (the Vietnam war). These are matters of inciple, which politicians observe when it serves eir purposes; they are also weights in the balance the national vote. If the Republican leadership ere thinking clearly, it would put its boot to the Birches and cry for an end to the killing. Eisenhower, fter all, made it to the White House by promising end the war in Korea (and stayed there by ending). But in the devious course of its descent to oblivion, e GOP is doing exactly the reverse.

On right-wing extremism it started off bravely, nam- g names. Sen. Thruston Morton denounced the John irch Society as a group in the same class with the ommunists or the Ku Klux Klan. Governor Robert mylie of Idaho was another crusader. But then the igh command had second thoughts. Robert Welch ould be castigated, but not the Society. The GOP co-rdinating committee put out a safe, general statenent against extremism. If the Birchites felt the shoe itted, they could put it on. They didn't. Instead, they an big ads in the major newspapers on the day of the oordinating committee's meeting, calling attention to heir unmatched anti-communism. The Society's pokesman, John Rousselot, said it was a splendid tatement. His gratification was understandable.

Little attempt was made to conceal the reason for he party's backing away from the earlier vehemence of some of its leaders. The reason was money. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, the head money-raiser, is miserable and, according to some reports, has been threatening to quit. The fact is that the Birch brand of politics is more attractive to many potential big contributors than moderate Republicanism, and by avoiding an outright condemnation and crying for unity the party hopes to keep its hand in their pockets.

The same ethical splendor shines in the GOP stand on Vietnam. Everybody knows by now that, barring a small miracle, the war is going to be the big issue of the 1966 elections. It is a dirty war and the Republicans are making it a dirty issue. They are warning the Johnson Administration against getting the country into "an endless, Korean-type jungle war," and at the same time shoving Mr. Johnson into precisely that kind of conflict. They want him to bomb Haiphong and Hanoi, establish a blockade, impose economic sanctions against allied nations that are shipping contraband to North Vietnam, declare war, etc. If Mr. Johnson takes these measures, and the war still goes badly, they will denounce him for not winning it. If he refrains, he will be accused of shamefully wasting the lives of American boys. They will tell the American people that if only Mr. Johnson had used the Navy and the Air Force with greater resolution the war would long since have been won. Johnson will find himself accused of not doing what Goldwater would have done (although he has been an agile and compliant disciple) and a certain number of voters, especially those with friends and relatives in the Vietnam hell hole—or just sorry for the victims in uniform—will fall for it. Or so, at any rate, the GOP strategists hope.

To Senator Dirksen, the GOP has finally driven off "the ghost of extremism." But it is not so; the ghost is still there, and the more ghoulish the party becomes, the more closely the ghost will haunt it. It is clear already that a decent, principled stand, a call for a cease-fire, for instance, is not to be expected from the Republicans; or, at the moment, from many Democrats.

Peace and Protestantism

The war in Vietnam is merely the latest—but one of the ugliest—episodes in the cold war. John Foster Dulles, who helped set the cold war in motion, was a power in the Federal Council of Churches and, ironically, from 1941 to 1947 chairman of its Commission on a Just and Enduring Peace. Later, Dulles served as arbiter on international affairs for the National Council of Churches, successor to the Federal Council and the most important Protestant organization in the United States. The National Council was one of Dulles' principal forums for the strategy of keeping the peace by threatening war.

Now a change is taking place in the Council, and the prime mover in that development is a man with antecedents as respectable as those of Dulles—Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, a Methodist and a Republican, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare under President Eisenhower, and currently president of the University of Oregon.

On December 3, the general board of the National Council of Churches, by a vote of 93 to 10 with 6 abstentions, adopted a policy statement and message to the churches on the Vietnam war. "We confront with sorrow," the statement began, "the profound and widespread war-suffering of the Vietnamese people both North and South and others who are involved in the conflict, including personnel in military and other forms of service and families of our own and other nations." Both in words and tone, this preamble should put to shame those professed Christians who are clamoring for a further and even more horrible escalation of the war.

The statement goes on to approve some actions and attitudes of the Johnson Administration and the United Nations — in particular that so far the population centers of North Vietnam have not been bombed. It then calls for a cessation of all bombing of North Vietnam "for a sufficient period to create more favorable circumstances for negotiations to begin and with a simultaneous effort to induce the North Vietnam Government to stop sending military personnel and material into South Vietnam." It asks for a cease-fire agreement (including cessation of terrorist activities) under UN supervision, and names the National Liberation Front as an interested party.

Still another recommendation, among a total of eight, is for a phased withdrawal of all U.S. troops and bases from Vietnamese territory, "if and when they can be replaced by adequate international peace-keeping forces, composed of military contingents capable of maintaining order while the peace settlement is being worked out."

It must be remembered that the purpose of the National Council was to seek a consensus on which all Christians and men of good will generally could agree; further, that the Council, as spokesman for the major Protestant groupings, is a force to be reckoned with. But it remains to be seen to what extent the National Council will succeed in inducing local church groups and affiliates to mobilize behind its recommendations.

The Nation finds the statement admirable, but doubts that a cessation of bombing alone will induce the North Vietnamese and the Chinese to call a halt to hostilities. The United States, with its overwhelming air power, is the stronger party in this conflict. It could well afford to stop the bombing, both north and south, and to call a unilateral cease-fire, with our troops firing only if fired upon. This might not work either, but it would have a much better chance than a mere reversion to the status of last February. The other measure which might have some effect would be for the Catholic Church in the United States to issue an appeal paralleling that of the National Council of Churches. The civil war in Vietnam, into which the United States has now injected itself as the principal belligerent, had its inception in the conflict between the Communist Vietminh and the Catholic minority. Yet it is no more in the interest of American Catholics than American Protestants or American Jews to incur the hatred of a majority of Asians as we use our air power to devastate an Asian country. The National Council has provided a rallying point. Now all men of good will must act; it is probably the last chance before the final inhibition on military force is lifted.

Straws in the Wind

Ours is a peculiarly violent and labile country; our crime rate is the highest in the world, and we have a record of political hysteria dating back to the Haymarket cases and before. Our 20th-century wars have all been followed by mass persecution: the Korean War brought into fastastic power the clownish ax man who held in his hand the names of 157 card-carrying Communists in the State Department. Now, with the rising casualties and rising frustrations in Vietnam, the manic phase is under way once more.

California State Treasurer Bert A. Betts, a norn ly mild-mannered Democrat, has been calling for x-pulsion of three University of California student at Berkeley who participated in sit-ins and teach-ins nd the firing of faculty members who became associ ed with such activities. He is among those who now ll "treason" at certain opponents of the Vietnam war. et the hysteria expand, and it will be surprising if ey do not regard all opposition as traitorous.

Draft boards are resorting to reclassification of ar dissenters; universal service is now to become a bra h of penology (see article by Carl Cohen, p. 520 is issue). A federal judge sentenced David Mitchel a draft objector, to five years in jail and fined n $5,000 (he is furious because Mitchell's attorney t d to bring the Nuremberg trials into the case). The s-tice Department is studying whether leaflets urg g American troops in Vietnam not to fight "any m e than you have to" (the maxim which most sold s in all armies follow anyway) involve sedition or t son. And an associate director of the FBI out-Hoov s Hoover by deploring the " 'celebrity status' which s often been accorded those morally and emotion y immature misfits who have cast a shadow of disgr e across the streets of many American communities a d the campuses of some of our educational institution " He lumps them with "racketeers, Communists, n cotics peddlers, filth merchants and others of th r ilk. . . ."

"When beats the drum," the proverb says, "laws e dumb."

Hospitals in Storage

The Office of Civil Defense has 2,000 crated h pitals stashed around the country, ready to patch any citizens who escape incineration in an aton blast. Only now it appears that they are not all th ready.

Arnold Dodge, head of the OCD's hospital syste announced last week, after completing the first she cleaning in nine years, that $22 million and possil as much as $50 million worth of drugs and suppl had gone bad and must be thrown away. Some of had been useless for a long time. So far nobody h benefited, as Sen. William Proxmire recently point out, except the drug companies.

That wasn't all the bad news. Dodge also report that some regular civilian hospitals had "borrowe supplies from the crated emergency clinics and h never returned the drugs. The taxpayer paid twic once when he bought the drugs for civil defense, ar a second time when he went itno the regular ho pital. Oh yes, and one other thing. Twenty millic dollars' worth of plasma was lost when doctors feare that it might be tainted and converted it into anoth supply.

Waste, waste, and the public might as well get use to it. Dodge expects to lose 1 per cent of the supplie each year through spoilage. At present this woul mean throwing only $2 million a year into the ashcar t if the civil defense system grows according to his pes, it will eventually mean discarding an annual 0 million in drugs and supplies.

The Office of Civil Defense is reorganizing its hostal program. At present communities contribute the ace for the packaged hospitals, and one change it s in mind is to start paying federal money for rental pace. Dodge thinks $100 a month per unit would be “minimum” to expect, and he foresees that eventually 500 hospitals will be stored around the country. That mes to nearly a million a month in rent, ten million year—enough to build half a dozen average hositals. Every political leech in the country will be tryg to rent his barn to the government, and 9,500 of em will succeed.

edside Manner

That black is red is a basic leg of the segregationist yllogism; and, with this in mind, the fast-breaking urve slung off early this month by Edwin Willis, chairan of the House Committee on Un-American Activiies, should come as no surprise to anyone who's wonered when HUAC would get around to its real task.

The committee has been “investigating” the operaions of the Ku Klux Klan, which is about the same as neighborhood-improvement association's taking a ong, hard look at the church's bingo game: it's obiously immoral, but what the hell.

Mr. Willis told reporter Dom Bonafede, of the New ork Herald Tribune that he was pleased with the ay the Klan hearings were going, and that they “have ot only torn the veil of the so-called Invisible Empire ut have uncovered strange bedfellows under the heet.” These strange bedfellows he named as Martin uther King, James Farmer and the Communist Party. They are all in the same bed opposing the hearing.”

When the Klan hearings got under way, it was dificult to see how Willis would be able to get on the ight side of the racist tracks. It proved to be no trick t all for the Louisiana Congressman.

nvitation to a Conversation

During the month of December, Poland sent to New York an exhibition of seventeen of its contemporary painters (D'Arcy Galleries) and the United States sent to Warsaw, Cracow, and other towns of their family origin six Congressmen of Polish descent. This exchange is admirable—it fosters a growth of understanding, of tolerance, of affection. The Congressmen represent, naturally enough, Polish-American communities, and these by and large have been almost pathologically anti-Communist; the trip, thus, took some courage on the legislators' part, and they were rewarded by a welcome that clearly moved them.

The art show in New York must also have called for courage on the part of some Polish officials, for the works shown are at the opposite pole of official taste in Communist countries. The exhibition was not very well received here, but that is irrelevant—our critics treated it as they would a show originating anywhere in the West: for its inherent merit and with no political embarrassment.

The guardians of American culture might take heart from this event. We hedge the art we send abroad—and particularly to Eastern Europe—with so many extraneous considerations that almost nothing gets sent. If Winslow Homer were still our most eminent painter there would be no trouble: politicians, curators and the art community could agree that he was a suitable ambassador. But our dominant painting is anti-conformist, anti-establishment, deliberately upsetting. Send it nevertheless. The Poles may admire it, or they may jeer at it. In any case they will learn that the United States is not a chrome laboratory of push-button impersonality, but a nation seeking relevant values and intelligible communication after half a century of violent change. The object of cultural exchange is not that we should be feared or emulated; it is that we should be drawn into a friendly conversation. The Poles—and indeed the nations of Eastern Europe generally—have been quicker than the Americans to grasp this point.

The Best Weapons

Secretary McNamara and the Joint Chiefs of Staff can now relax: a remarkable new strategist has emerged. His qualifications, to be sure, are somewhat out of relation to his self-confidence, but perhaps that is the mark of a great tactician. In any case, the new expert, Mayor Samuel Yorty of Los Angeles, can hardly fare worse than some we have already had in Vietnam. While on a junket to Japan, Mayor Yorty was invited by Pentagon brass to pay Vietnam a visit—on the theory, no doubt, that a man who had managed the race relations of Los Angeles so brilliantly must be qualified to give pointers to our civilian and military aides.

On returning home, the Mayor gave a luncheon in his own honor and there held forth at length on what we should do in Vietnam. We should use “the best weapons,” which are, of course, nuclear weapons; but we should not use them on civilians. We should begin to think about “liberating” North Vietnam. We should “stop worrying about world opinion . . . this is not a popularity contest.” And we should stop “restraining our fighting men” and “pleading with the Communists” for discussions. As for the protesters and those who dissent from the official Washington line, we should expose them and the “hard-core Communists” behind them. And oh, yes, we should send more troops into Vietnam, right away.

Standing against the backdrop of a huge map of Southeast Asia in the Statler Hilton, before an audience made up exclusively of henchmen and hangers-on, the Mayor, pointer in hand, explained that if Vietnam falls, “all Southeast Asia will fall to the Communists.” Maybe those captive listeners accepted Mayor Yorty's recipe for victory with honor, but the odds are strong that they were the only true believers among the vast multitudes of Los Angeles.

AFL-CIO Convention

B. J. Widic

San Francisco

This sixth constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO stands in most respects in marked contrast to the exciting merger meeting in New York City ten years ago. World events and the changing composition of the union movement itself have left a deep imprint on the AFL-CIO.

If there was a single theme at the founding convention it was the promise of unity for organizational gains and social progress. The excitement in 1955 came from the prospect of fusing the spirit and dynamism of the CIO with the revitalized AFL. Vocal concern over the hard-line foreign policies—the rigid anti-communism of President George Meany, under the alleged influence of Jay Lovestone—was muted in the belief that over a period of time the more knowledgeable and sophisticated Reuther brothers would downgrade Lovestone, and give labor a fresh voice with more flexible ideas on the world scene. And soon, the optimists hoped, the fiery Walter Reuther would influence and then replace the elder George Meany.

In 1965, the first two days of the convention were a drumbeat of mobilization behind the policy of unconditional and uncritical support of the Administration's policies abroad. There was total preoccupation with the war in Vietnam, and the reverberations of the escalation overcame all other sounds. Its crescendo was reached in the ovation given Dean Rusk, whose views of world history and current events were expressed as a "good guys versus bad guys" speech. In an encore, Vice President Hubert Humphrey added the flavor of "guns and whipped cream," and assured the delegates that "there isn't a war monger in Washington in high position."

President Johnson phoned a message, the national commander of the American Legion said his piece, as did Alexis Johnson, of the State Department. Finally, President George Meany made a total of four speeches: all on the central point of unreserved support for the Johnson Administration.

Much of this could have been expected, but the intensity of the drive to indicate that the labor hierarchy was behind current foreign policy was somewhat surprising. In this atmosphere there were no doubters, and no room for doubt; no dissenters, and no room for dissent. The convention saw reality with no shades of good or evil; it was a caucus in black and white.

On Monday afternoon, without dissent or discussion, the following policy statement on the Dominican Republic was adopted as part of a resolution on Latin America:

> However, in Santo Domingo, the leaders of a popular revolution faltered and opened the door for various pro-Communist groups to take over strategic positions from which they could seize power. These totalitarians forthwith began to subvert the popular revolution. . . . After the experience with the Castro-Moscow missile machinations of October, 1962, it was clear that outside intervention in Santo Domingo was urgent in order to overcome the immediate risk of another Cuba-type regime which could become an additional threat to the freedom of the Americas and the peace of the world. Furthermore, the Communist depredations in Santo Domingo have been only part of the widespread campaign of terrorism in Colombia, Guatemala, Peru, and other Latin American countries. It is to the credit of our country that its efforts in the Dominican crisis have been directed toward preventing a military take-over, hastening the restoration of constitutional government, speeding the economic reconstruction, and enabling even the most outspoken political opponents to enjoy full freedom of criticism of U.S. policies.

Perhaps the clue to this astonishing version of events may be found in Dean Rusk's comments on the close liaison he has enjoyed with President Meany over a number of years. This seems a more logical explanation of the resolution's State Department tone than dismissing AFL-CIO "mistakes" as the handiwork of Jay Lovestone.

For this convention was dominated totally by George Meany, n only in foreign policy but in eve important decision down to eve replacement in AFL and CIO amon the aging leadership. The flavor o the gathering may have been caugh by the TV showing of a brief inc dent which occurred after Dea Rusk's pedestrian assurances on th crisis and the war in Vietnam. band of about fifty youths in th gallery displayed signs urging peac and debate, and they chanted "De bate, debate," and apparentl "Peace" (the booing from the dele gates made it difficult to distinguis the words). From the platform President Meany ordered the gal leries cleared of what he calle "kookies," and the scorn in his voic reflected convention sentiment.

The disdain of President Mean and his colleagues for any variet of peace movement or, more im portant, for any debate or doubt about foreign policy was indicate by the harsh treatment of Senato Fulbright in a resolution adopte unanimously by the executive board The resolution also states tha "many in the West felt that it woul be possible to establish genuin peaceful coexistence through ex panded trade and cultural ex changes with the Communist bloc The AFL-CIO, we are told, "never shared those spurious hopes."

Out of the 928 delegates presen in San Francisco, only two impor tant officials had previously indi cated serious disagreement with the hard-line official policy. Until the UAW executive board, under the di rection of Walter Reuther, adopted a strong resolution of endorsement for President Johnson's policies, the secretary-treasurer of the United Automobile Workers Union, Emil Mazey, had publicly criticized the Dominican Republic. Late in the convention he reminded the assembled brothers that labor had fought hard for the right to disagree and should defend that right for others; he deplored Meany's crass treatment of the Vietnam protesters—and, according to The New York Times, received scant applause for his words. Pat Gorman of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butchers was until recently considered a dissenter, he has now rejected any asso- tion with critics of foreign policy. Fhe recent Freedom House pol- statement on the war in Vietnam s signed by—among others— ılter P. Reuther, Charles Zim- rman of the ILGWU and Richard xon. This is evidence of the pres- e for total national unity, and role of the trade union move- nt in achieving it. The success the Johnson Administration in taining such unreserved support m the trade unions is a major litical achievement. This rich and stitutionalized movement becomes t only a bulwark for the Adminis- ition but a strong counter force any criticism from dissenters or ubters in the nation. The decision the Building and Construction ades Department to mobilize "a tion-wide series of positive meet- gs, rallies and publicity cam- igns on our country's policies," derstandably received specific hite House congratulations.

One of the few moments when e convention seemed to be living the real world as it moves swift- into a new phase of war escala- on came with the speech of A. ilip Randolph, on the civil rights solution. He warned against the nsequences of the drive to slow wn and emasculate the Negro rust for social justice. One won- ered what will happen when this d warrior leaves the executive uncil. The NAACP had sent a legram urging more new Negro aders in the top structure of the nion movement, but who will they and where will they come from?

The mood of the convention, it concerned itself with nar- w trade union matters, was ne of self-satisfaction. President leany's report pointed out that The AFL-CIO membership shows n increase of 430,000 between 955 and the average for the two- ear period ending September 30, 965. The actual increase between December, 1955, and November, 965, is, however, about 700,000." hus Meany felt himself entitled to eer a little: "It will be interesting see how our critics, who two years go wrote of us as stagnant, out of tyle, and over the hill, will account or the strange turn now, when we re two years older." The viewpoint eminds one of a businessman who rosses more this year than last but ails to note that his share of the narket has declined in a period of expansion. Using either total civilian labor force or nonfarm work force as a reference point, the proportionate share of union membership continues to decline. And no one at San Francisco was predicting a significant breakthrough in white-collar areas.

"P.S. Nobody Likes the War but it's Good for Business"

The changes in union membership have another important aspect. Except for the excluded teamsters union which registered about 300,000 more members in the past decade, the unions which grew were old-line AFL, and those that lost membership were the former CIO unions. This shift accounts in part for the ascendancy of the ideology and personality of George Meany. Auto, steel, textile among others, each lost more than 100,000 members in the past ten years. The AFL retail clerks picked up more than 150,000, the AFL electrical workers more than 200,000, the operating engineers more than 100,000, and the building service union more than 100,000. These unions have scant patience for oratory of the Reuther variety; they are satisfied with President Meany's evaluation of the world and their place in it.

Given the increase in the national work force, the AFL-CIO needed an annual increase of 250,000 members after 1955 to maintain its proportion of union membership, and it fell seriously short of this pace. The lag tends to be lost in the context of a growing economy calculated to reach a $700 billion Gross National Product next year. In this society both collective bargaining and unionism are so institutionalized that there now exist about 150,000 contracts between labor and management, with most of them for two- and three-year periods, and most of them containing wage improvements annually. And with union dues totaling annually about $750 million, the short-run illusion of success is understandable.

Apparently the discussion of this affluence within the hierarchy is the source of Walter Reuther's recent remark about a "Bankers' Mentality" among some trade union leaders. It fits also into the executive council's recommendation of a raise for President Meany from $45,000 to $50,000, with the additional provision that Meany receive another $20,000 per year while he serves as president of the AFL-CIO.

leadership from two directions. First, the teamsters union is no longer an acute problem. James Hoffa is so deeply preoccupied with legal entanglements that he has apparently adopted a live-and-let-live strategy. His executive board, meeting recently at Las Vegas, produced a quiet and subdued Hoffa, a man who wasn't making big plans or even blocking the pretensions of Harold Gibbons or Einor Mohn to be his successor if his convictions are sustained by the Supreme Court. The teamsters will be welcomed back quickly into the AFL-CIO if Hoffa goes and Mohn takes over. In this respect, Mohn has a jump on Gibbons who has many important enemies in the AFL-CIO. The return of the teamsters would add 1.5 million members.

The second promising development is that all signs at the convention—the firm commitment of President Johnson and Vice President Humphrey and the private comments of labor leaders—pointed to another and more vigorous fight to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act which enables states to enact anti-union-shop legislation (nineteen states now have such laws). If the war in Vietnam expands as seems likely, the trade unions will have additional pressure at their disposal. They would offer a policy of "non-strike" in negotiations if requested, and a quid pro quo would be indicated. Besides, the draft calls are likely to become large enough to create some shortages in the labor market. This would place the unions in a position similar to that held by them during World War II, when unionism grew by 4 million members.

Hopes for the future combined with satisfaction in the recent past. Said Mr. Meany: "In two of the most productive legislative years in history we received medical care for the aged, a massive aid to education program, new civil rights laws, housing, tax cuts, an anti-poverty program, and new attacks on pollution, crime, illiteracy and discrimination. And to top it all off—a continuation of the prosperity and economic growth begun fifty-eight months ago by President Kennedy, the greatest and longest period of prosperity in modern times."

Hundreds of resolutions for more social welfare legislation were submitted to the convention—all predicated on the assumption that the American industrial machine can provide more guns and more butter indefinitely. Even while trade union leaders were living in euphoria, the dispatches from Washington and Texas indicated that the Johnson Administration is preparing to slow down the march toward a Great Society as the escalation of war turns the nation into a grim society.

In the context of world events, and given the unanimity of policy at this convention, the controversy and wild speculation about changes in union leadership were somewhat less than significant. The question of age was really minor. George Meany, at 70, easily demonstrated all the vigor and firmness necessary to run the organization smoothly, tightly and efficier

LABOUR'S LLOYD GEORGE?

London

As the British Labour Government starts on its second year of office, the outward signs of endurance and vitality are impressive. Contrary to most prophecies, the minuscule majority in the House of Commons has not made effective government impossible. Almost miraculously, the public-opinion polls have moved sharply in the government's favor. Few observers doubt that if an election were held now or in the near future, the Labour Party would substantially improve its position. For the first time since the narrowness of the majority disappointed left-wing hopes in October, 1964, a sustained period of Labour rule emerges as a distinct possibility.

Considering the alarms of the past twelve months, and whatever the verdict that may be reached on many of the government's individual policies, this achievement is considerable in itself. Week after week, the whole scene has been overcast by the threat to sterling and by the fear of ministers that if unpopular steps were not taken a first-class financial crisis might follow.

the Exchequer was introducing sh "economy" measures, appar- ly to comfort or appease the in- national financiers, it was as- ned that the Tory Opposition, ler the new, invigorating lead- hip of Edward Heath, would re- n to the House of Commons in vember, ready for the kill. Noth- of the sort happened in this nth's debates at the beginning of new session. With spectacular ldenness the political balance has ped in Labour's favor.

Much dispute is possible about causes of the change, but even most doctrinaire opponent of cult of personality could hardly rain from giving pride of place the phenomenon of Harold Wil- 1. Hardly a day passes without ne mesmerized political pundit the Conservative newspapers ac- owledging his skill and profes- nal competence. Up until a few nths ago it was his cunning that torted the most unrestrained trib- es; more recently, especially dur- g the Rhodesian crisis, the as- luous survey of his varied talents tends to his "statesmanship" and s infallible touch as "a national ader." And let it not be supposed at the adulation is merely part of e old Tory device of embracing e enemy. Mr. Wilson was, and ll is, positively hated by most ries. What they blurt out is the uth they never bargained for— at for the first time in its history e Labour Party has a leader who ands head and shoulders above s opponents in political intelli- nce, driving power and capacity seize the initiative. No such claim uld be made on behalf of Mac- onald, Attlee or Gaitskell. Wilson as the zest of a Truman, the cool- ess of a Macmillan; he may even ave the political acumen (as he rely has the deviousness) of a loyd George. It is a formidable mbination and the impact on the olitical temper of the country can- ot be underrated. Ever since Win- on Churchill made the accusation the 1920s, the familiar gibe gainst the Labour Party has been at it is "unfit to govern." Wilson hiefly, but assisted by several of is leading colleagues, has effec- vely buried the charge.

The second of Labour's ad- antages must be stated much more entatively, for the drama is unfin- shed. Yet in recent weeks, almost nexplicably, the strain on sterling has eased, the gnawing preoccupation of ministers with the immediate economic threat has been relieved. Here, indeed, if the present gusts of optimism blowing through Whitehall and Westminster are justified, a near miracle will have been achieved. Ever since November of last year, the main criticism of the government on its economic policies, from Conservatives and Socialists, from Right and Left, has been that it tackled the balance-of-payments crisis with old, discredited weapons. Higher interest rates, cutbacks of public expenditure, excessive deflation; these and kindred measures, said the critics, would merely produce the old stop-go cycle, serious unemployment and stagnation in the economy.

Indeed, it was this prospect, envisaged not merely by expectant Tories and downcast Socialists but by most orthodox economic opinion, which suggested in the spring and summer that Labour was heading for a crash. No amount of Wilsonian brilliance could distract attention from rising unemployment figures. And yet, as of now, it is the government rather than its critics that has been vindicated. So far this government's restrictive measures have operated much less crudely than those of its predecessors; so far there has been no jolting stop in the stop-go cycle. For generations, left-wing Socialists in Britain have assailed the reformism and timidity of their leaders, partly on the grounds that capitalists could be expected to run capitalism better than Socialists, and that Socialists would be wise therefore not to embark on the enterprise; they should instead seek to introduce a system of their own. But Mr. Wilson and his colleagues seem—momentarily, at least—to be running capitalism better than the capitalists. And since no one in his senses could expect them to introduce a social revolution with a majority of three, even left-wing members of the Labour Party can greet the event with cautious enthusiasm.

Labour has a number of lesser but considerable assets on its side. In the months ahead, some of the legislative reforms passed by Parliament in the past year will come into operation and the program for the new session comprises further measures which, apart from their other virtues, should assist in winning votes. Housing, says Wilson, is the great social problem of the 1960s, as unemployment was of the 1930s. His energetic and imaginative Housing Minister, Richard Crossman, has been given or has extracted a high priority in the government's social plans for his schemes. Several other reforms — especially those that cost little money—will be approved in the months ahead. Given no sudden transformation in the scene, the government can look forward to a successful year with the likelihood of a general election in the autumn. If opposition proved too obstreperous before then, the successful appeal to the polls could be made in the spring. For the government, either way the prospect pleases.

ministers themselves, but the very swiftness with which the present opportunity has developed should qualify their optimism. During the past year the government's popularity, according to the public polls, has not steadily risen or fallen; it has tended rather to zigzag. For all the present display of confidence, that experience is likely to be repeated in the future and the predicament of the government, arising from its small majority, remains. One or two deaths, necessitating by-elections in marginal constituencies at a moment when the government's popularity was low, could deprive it of a majority, and a general election forced by such circumstances would almost certainly be disastrous. How can the wary Mr. Wilson guard against such a hazard? One answer, accepted by many of the leading political commentators, is that the essential precaution has already been taken. Mr. Wilson, it is said, has made a tacit, undercover alliance with Jo Grimond's Liberal Party, thus raising his effective Parliamentary majority from two to roughly twenty. The legislative program for 1966 offers much to attract Liberal support and nothing to alarm it—in particular it does not include the bill to bring the steel industry into public ownership, the principal Socialist measure in Labour's program.

No such deal with the Liberals, direct or indirect, does in fact exist, and on the issue of steel nationalization Mr. Wilson has taken an early opportunity to stress that, despite the omission of the measure from this year's proposed legislation, it remains a firm commitment of his government. But the stir created by the apparent retreat on this central test of Socialist planning is no more than one sign of the widespread suspicion and disillusion which the government's strategy and policies have aroused on the Left of the party.

While the country at large has increasingly admired Mr. Wilson's skill, while the Right and Center of the party in the main have increasingly offered their enthusiastic approval, the Left has been bitterly disappointed. On Vietnam, on defense policy, on relations with the Soviet Union, on the so-called "East of Suez" posture adopted in Aden and Malaysia, on immigration policy, on the lack of more direct and interventionist economic measures —on all these issues in the past year the government has appeared to accept, reluctantly or readily, in part or in whole, the attitudes of its Conservative predecessors. And, say some, the tactics for the present session, the dropping of steel, the unspoken reliance on the Liberals, are merely fresh proof that the bipartisan outlook and non-Socialist tendencies of the administration have become more deliberate. "THE DAY THEY BURIED SOCIALISM," ran one screaming headline in a Conservative newspaper when the news was finally published about the steel bill.

Nothing in fact is so precise the highly fluid state of prese British politics. It could be that t trends which have drained all se blance of socialism from most the European Social Democra parties are operating here and th Mr. Wilson is content to presi over the process. But it cou also be that the only resort of government must be, at a reaso ably early date, to fight a fresh el tion, and that a substantial Labo victory could once again sharp the division in British society a produce a government capable a prepared to carry through tru radical change. Mr. Wilson's political zest and energy would quali him to play that role too.

The stronger his position comes—in his own party it is ve strong—the more depends on wh his real vision is. No one know and, possibly, he does not kno himself. Fighting off the pressur of one crisis after another on th basis of a barely existing majorit he can have had little time to thi in terms of longer perspectives. Th deep suspicion of the Left is th he prefers it that way, that he pos tively revels in the tests an glamour of an immediate crisis an despises longer aims as me theorizing. What are the guidin principles of this supreme empir cist, of Labour's Lloyd George? Th same question was asked of th earlier Lloyd George and even t day the historians quarrel abou the answer.

PUNISHMENT BY CONSCRIPTION

General Hershey's Big Stick . . . . . . Carl Cohe

A recent incident at Ann Arbor, Mich., and ensuing events, have given rise to serious doubts about the propriety of the uses to which the Selective Service System is now being put.

On October 15, thirty-nine persons, all but one of them students at the University of Michigan, were arrested in Ann Arbor for trespassing while engaged in civil disobedience to protest United States policy in Vietnam. To make their protest as effective as possible, the students had focused upon the instrument of military conscription; their disobedience took the form of sitting on the floor of the office of the local board of the Selective Service System. During the period of their sit-in the work of the clerks went on as usual, although not, of course, without interruption.

Upon arrest, most of the demonstrators went limp and had to be carried from the building to waiting police vans. In the local court most of those arrested pleaded nolo contendere, were found guilty of trespassing and sentenced to ten days in the county jail. Upon sentencing them, Judge Francis O'Brien made very clear that the were being punished not for the ex pression of their views upon Amer can foreign policy, but because o their planned, deliberate violatio of the law. The students' reques for a stay in the execution of th sentence, so that they might serv their ten days during the Christma holiday and avoid academic pena ty, was refused. Their cases wer appealed to the circuit court, wit the intention of dropping that ap peal just prior to the university' Christmas recess in December.

the state headquarters of the chigan Selective Service, Col. thur B. Holmes. He announced at the sit-in had been "an overt olation of the Selective Service t," and might result in the ange of the draft classification some of the protesters (most of hom were at that time classified students, 2-S) and in their im- ediate induction. Twelve days er Colonel Holmes sent an "evalu- ion" of the incident to the local aft board of each of the male idents. He contended that the otest disrupted Selective Service fice procedure, that that could be terpreted as a violation of Sec- on 12 of the Universal Military aining and Service Act, and that me among the students involved ould thereby lose their student de- rments. He insisted, however, at the decision in each case would st with the local draft board. In e weeks that followed four of the otesting students have been re- assified 1-A.

The reaction of the Ameri- n Civil Liberties Union of Michi- n, of the Democratic Party of lichigan, and of the University of lichigan, has been sharp. ACLU tate Chairman Rollo O'Hare ondemned the use of the Selective ervice Act as a device to punish olitical protest. Colonel Holmes's atement, he said, "mocks our tra- itional national belief that patri- tic duty and honor, not simply engeance, are served by donning e nation's uniform." The ACLU lans soon to file with the circuit ourt, requesting a federal declara- ory judgment to end further re- lassification, and to restore the riginal classification in the cases f the four students. The State Central Committee of the Demo- ratic Party unanimously approved resolution which said, in part, "If lemonstrators break the law, they hould be prosecuted under the law, ut the draft status of the student lemonstrators should not be used s an instrument of thought con- rol."

Democratic Rep. Charles Diggs of Detroit joined with several Democratic state legislators in sending dentical and highly critical letters o Colonel Holmes, in which they harged that the Selective Service System was pursuing a "dictatorial and unrepresentative draft policy." They condemned Holmes's role in the students' reclassification, saying: "Your office has become the punitive arm of society and as such has infringed on the traditional separation of governmental powers, as you become a judiciary."

At the University of Michigan the reaction has been a mixture of pain, anger and disbelief. The president of the Student Government Council called the investigation by the Selective Service System "a violation of the rights of petition and a repressive act." Vice presidents of the University, Cutler and Smith, issued a formal statement, arguing that

> . . . satisfactory educational progress by the student is in our judgment the controlling, if not the sole factor upon which deferment should be based. This we understand to be the existing national policy. To introduce other factors into the decision makes possible either individual favoritism or individual punitive action, either of which is clearly unwise and potentially discriminatory.

This statement has been strongly endorsed in a formal resolution of the Student Government Council, and in a statement by the president of the university, Dr. Harlan Hatcher, who expressed great concern that such reclassification could "warp and degrade the entire concept of the draft." He insisted that "Selective Service must not be allowed to become an instrument for punishing dissent."

General Louis B. Hershey, director of the National Selective Service System, stated his position in a telephone interview given to the student newspaper, The Michigan Daily. General Hershey said he told Holmes that the sit-in constituted a violation of the Selective Service Act, and that the students' "conduct ought to be graded. The government would be committing suicide if it deferred students who defied the selective service laws." He said he was perfectly willing to take complete responsibility in the affair, and made it clear that he does view induction as a punishment, and deems the use of this punishment upon recalcitrant students to be appropriate and just. "I happen to be one of those old-fashioned fathers," he said, "who never let pity interfere with a spanking."

There the matter stands at present. The possibilities for the appeal of the draft reclassifications is likely to keep the fate of the students concerned in doubt for weeks or months to come.

Several features of this series of events deserve wide and careful notice. First, the vigor and clarity of the response to use of the draft as punishment is heartening. The reaction throughout Michigan has been widespread and well articulated. Even those who despise the protesters and their cause have voiced concern that using the conscriptive power of the federal government to threaten those who protest against its policies is the deepest kind of wrong in a democracy.

But, second, the damage already done is not easily undone. The four students may succeed in regaining their student deferments. But whether they do or not the injury to them is minor compared to the injury already done to the nation as a whole. Hundreds of thousands of university students have been effectively threatened. How can they now be sure that the same power will not be used against them, if they wish to express a political view that conflicts with the government line?

Third, these recent events reinforce the conclusion that in recent months and years the University of Michigan has become a tower of strength in the defense of the genuinely free speech of its students and faculty. Student political protests, some distasteful to the vast majority of the university, have been tolerated patiently and wisely by faculty and administration alike. The president of the university, speaking recently to potential donors, said that although such student activism may frighten some gifts away, students at his university will continue to enjoy fully all of their rights as citizens of a democracy. The spirit of the university as a whole is now one in which all — Communists and Nazis included — may have their say. In such an atmosphere the quality of teaching and research has risen steadily; the university has become more and more attractive to the best students and to faculty of the highest caliber; education has become more exciting, more meaningful, more effective. And the greatest benefactors have been the state of Michigan and the nation.

Fourth, the potential punitive use of the "Universal" Military Training Act casts the gravest doubts on the justice of that act as a whole. If some may be punished for an alleged wrongdoing by being inducted into military service, what shall we say of those who were inducted into military service without wrongdoing? For what were they punished? But punished they have been, in precisely the same way. It will not do to reply that Selective Service should not be used as a punitive instrument. Of course it should not. But it is painfully evident that conscription is viewed by both the potential draftee and the agency that inducts him as a penalty, the infliction of harm and inconvenience (not to mention possible injury and death) upon some but not others. Military conscription in a democracy is fundamentally unhealthy, and should be eliminated. But if seems very doubtful) its contir tion is a necessity for national vival, the inductive system sho be so genuinely universalized as

Finally, no one will dispute

P. R. IN THE FORESTS . . . . . . Grant McConne

If your vacation wanderings of the last few summers have taken you into the Mount Baker National Forest of Washington State, you have probably encountered a new sort of billboard. Its wording varies, sometimes even its topic, but its purpose is constant: to maintain a bureaucratic empire serving the logging industry of a handful of small communities now surrounded by cut-over land. The billboards themselves, expensively carved in large slabs of Western red cedar, are the work of the United States Forest Service. They are commonly located at turn-out points of scenic beauty. Being the product of a public agency, they presumably are beyond the reach of any anti-billboard law. Nevertheless, billboards is what they are. More, they are weapons in a massive public relations campaign and their central message is political propaganda.

Grant McConnell teaches political science at the University of Chicago. In an early issue Robert G. Sherrill will discuss the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

tention attractors for the pay-c which seeks to mobilize support a Forest Service policy that is

ch a patch cut, states that the gging has been carefully regulated avoid erosion. The particular cut deed seems to bear out the claim; owever, if one glances back at another cut-over patch from a point 00 yards beyond, erosion is both ovious and serious. Another sign oclaims that an area was cut ten ars before and then replanted. It so placed that the tourist naturally oks to a hillside of virgin forest ther than to the nearby scrub.

Such billboards are to be found many parts of the National For- t areas of the West, almost in- ariably in spots of great natural eauty. In most parts of the National orests, logging is clearly the prin- pal service which the forests can ffer and about these there is no ispute; with respect to the scenic reas of high quality, however, ere is controversy and in them e signs are sprouting. The bill- oards are probably nowhere denser an in the Mount Baker Forest. he background here is that, be- tedly, a substantial number of lo- al citizens and individuals from idely scattered parts of the nation ave discovered the North Cascades much of it is in part of Mount aker Forest) and then learned he plans of the Forest Service with espect to it.

The North Cascades until very re- ently has been—and to a large legree still is—an area of near- y pristine wilderness. It is also an rea holding the greatest concentra- ion of natural beauty in the entire nited States. A labyrinth of deep alleys incised among high and agged peaks, it has more and arger glaciers than all of the Rocky Mountains of the United States. Here, mountain relief is often more han 6,000 feet. Glacier Peak, one of the most exquisite of volcanos, rises to 10,500 feet above sea level, while the bottom of Lake Chelan is 400 feet below sea level and lies in a canyon more than 9,000 feet deep at points, the deepest chasm in North America. In the narrow val- leys are delicate meadows superior to any found in the Alps, and cathedrallike groves of great trees. By almost any standard, the area is pre-eminent among the scenic splendors of America. A 1937 study proposing a national park in the area stated that such a park would "outrank in its scenic, recreational and wild-life values any existing national park and any other possibility for such a park within the United States."

Given such a land and such an evaluation, it would seem obvious that public policy should be directed to providing for the area the most complete and careful protection of which the nation is capable. Nevertheless, logging and other practices of the most destructive sort are planned and, in fact, are already being rushed into operation. The response of forest authorities to the protests of public-minded citizens is to accelerate the timber sales and to mount a massive public relations campaign of ranger speeches to civic clubs, inspired stories in newspapers, Potemkin village tours for local leaders, and the billboards.

During the next few months, and perhaps years, the North Cascades will be the battleground of the greatest and most important struggle for conservation in recent time. There have been other struggles and some notable accomplishments in the last few years—Cape Cod, Canyonlands, Point Reyes and others. None of these, or even all collectively, have had the importance of the North Cascades, whose more than 2 million acres are of a quality justifying the highest superlatives. Yet a dispute rages as to whether any of it should be preserved for future generations. Over the years, numerous proposals have been made for saving the North Cascades, but each has succumbed before sharp and often highly disingenuous attacks. This time, however, conservation organizations are aroused and the mood of the public is different. The Kennedy administration made a strong new beginning in the conservation of the nation's scenic areas. Yet, it was unwilling to tackle the North Cascades, and in 1963 put the issue on ice by appointing an inter-agency study commission (including the Forest Service). The commission will soon report, and the issue will be before the public and ultimately before Congress. The battle will be bitter.

Why should there be any issue or dispute on the matter at all? The answer is not simple and goes to the heart of the conservation problem across the nation. It would be easy to say that there is deep rivalry and jealousy between two bureaucracies, the Forest Service and the Park Service, one an agency of the Department of Agriculture, the other of the Department of the Interior. To say this, however, is only to touch the surface. The Forest Service, which has had jurisdiction over the area since its own creation, has had a reputation as one of the ablest and most enlightened agencies of the government. It was the chief administrative accomplishment of the progressive movement and did more than any other body to slow the exploitation of public lands that so disgraces American history. Under the aggressive and political leadership of Gifford Pinchot, it achieved substantial independence inside the Department of Agriculture, and freedom from influence either by the Presidency, changing administrations or "politics" (i.e., parties). Always directed with great skill, it managed to preserve this independence and perhaps achieved its height of political power by directing and managing the fight which defeated FDR's reorganization plan in 1937.

As with other reforming and formally independent agencies, time and exposure took their toll. In order to survive and also maintain its bureaucratic autonomy, the Forest Service had to accommodate itself to the interest groups whose activities it was supposed to regulate. Over time, the service, like such other independent regulatory agencies as the ICC, the CAB and the SEC, acquired as its own constituency a particular industry, in this case lumber. Thus, in symbiotic relationship, there lies behind the Forest Service a strongly organized and determined lumbering industry.

The building of this relationship has been strongly fostered by several other forces. One of these is the way in which Forest Service personnel are selected and trained. As a highly professionalized service, the agency draws its career personnel from the schools of forestry. But these schools send most of their graduates into industry and until very recently their curricula have been strongly oriented to the wants of the industry.

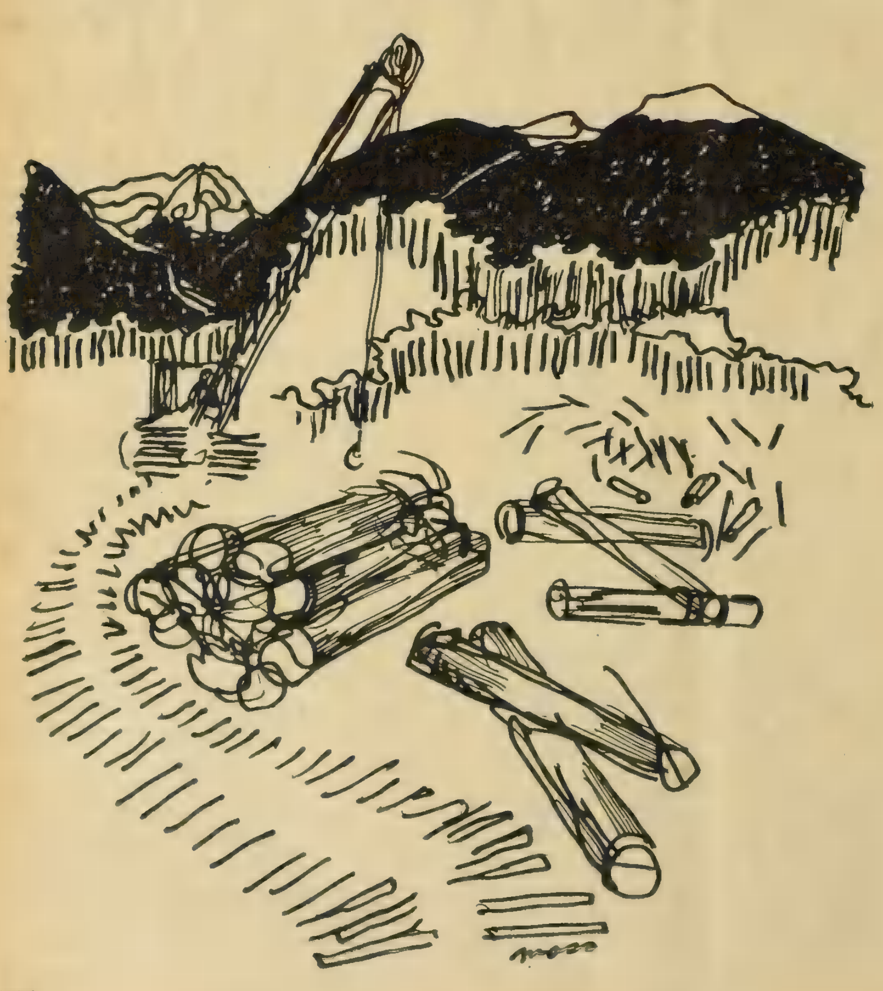
A second factor has emerged from the independence and "nonpolitical" character of the Forest Service. In order to maintain itself and build its own political system, the service has decentralized its operations in a manner for which it has been much praised. This has meant that regional and forest supervisors, even district rangers, have had large discretion. These officers have accordingly been able (and encouraged) to maintain close personal contact with the local communities in which they work. This contact, however, has led inevitably to closest association with individuals who are socially and politically most influential. In the forested areas where the agency operates, such individuals are naturally the mill owners and operators. Understandably, despite occasional family quarrels, an identity of outlook has grown up among industry, local leaders and service officials. The result is not corruption as it is commonly understood, but the public implications are nonetheless serious.

These implications did not become evident until rather recently. The forests were large and it appeared that they could offer something for everybody. The service coined the phrase "multiple use" to symbolize its past easy successes in keeping everyone happy. With a growing population, affluence and accelerated travel, however, the easy solution to conflicting demands is no longer available. "Multiple use" has been a pleasing slogan, but as a policy it is largely meaningless. It suggests that a given piece of land can be made to serve an array of different purposes. Sometimes this is possible; some purposes such as protection of water and scenery, for example, are compatible. Under such conditions there is no problem and no policy is needed. With other combinations such as scenery and logging, however, the conflict is serious and policy is needed if decisions are to be anything more than the expressions of the personal tastes and prejudices of the bureaucrats making them. As things stand, with "multiple use" as the only guideline, decisions on land use are resting on nothing more substantial or defensible.

So far the Forest Service has adamantly refused to face its problem. Its response to questioning and criticism has been the P.R. campaign and the iteration of the slogan of "multiple use" (latest variant: "Land of Many Uses"). It relies even more heavily on its longstanding political allies in the lumber industry and the local elites. It also attempts to gain popularity among the throngs of visitors now coming to the forests for their holidays. This takes the form of road building (paid for by logging in the areas "opened up"), roadlike trails comfortably available to motorcycles, and similar facilities for mass use. This latest and somewhat desperate phase of the struggle for political support only accelerates the destruction of the essential values of the areas in the forests which have drawn the new visitors in the first place. This, however, is beside the point of the effort, which is preservation not of the nation's scenic heritage but of the political system of which the Forest Service is the culminating part.

The stakes in this contest are large. They involve the survival or destruction of some of America's finest scenic areas. Ironically, however, they do not involve vast amounts of potential lumber, for the timbered valleys of high scenic quality are generally very narrow. The North Cascades fight is by all odds the biggest item in this struggle, but there are numerous other splendid areas within the vast empire of Forest Service lands which are under imminent threat of spoliation at agency fiat. In some areas, groups of outraged citizens have banded together to forestall the destruction until the public can be alerted to its stake. Often, however, it turns out that roads have already been pushed to the heads of timbered valleys at the very heart of scenic areas and logging started from the top downward. In such areas, the too-often-justified expectation of the Forest Service is that, with the finest parts of the scenery destroyed, there no longer will be any point in a public fight for preservation, and the lower valley points can then be logged at the industry's convenience. A few picnic tables along polluted streams then can give whatever substance was ever offered by "multiple use."

It is one of the tragedies of political life that a one-time crusading agency of government should become a major threat to the public interest it was created to defend. Yet this has happened before and we have not yet learned how to deal with the disease which brings it about. It is an even greater tragedy that just as prosperity and increasing population pressure are sending hundreds of thousands of Americans out in search of some more permanent values than dollars or board feet, the greatest resources in which those values are to be found are marked for quick destruction.



AIR SAFETY

The Lethal Lapses . . . . Karl M. Ruppenthal

n imminent catastrophe stopped at ragedy earlier this month when two ommercial air liners collided in nid-air. Had it not been for a miaculous combination of circumtances, two large planes might ave gone down in flames in a ensely populated area. It is not leasant to contemplate the holoaust that was narrowly averted.

Now that the wreckage has cooled nd grateful thanks have been iven, some serious probing should egin. Skilled investigators from he CAB are already on the scene. ecause one plane is largely intact nd most of the crew members survived the ordeal, they should be able o determine what actually occurred nd why. In due course, the board vill publish an accident report detailing the event and describing vhat went wrong. If it is well done, t may minimize the possibility of ther accidents arising from similar ailures.

It would be pointless to speculate t this time about what this investigation may reveal. There are too nany possibilities that have not yet een fully explored. But one thing s certain now: the official accident eport will not go far enough. By nd large, the CAB investigation eams do a creditable job, but the act is that several important areas re completely beyond their purview and responsibility.

Several of our major airports nd nearby airways are completely aturated with planes at certain ours of the day. The congestion is o great at prime departure hours rom New York that dozens of lights each day are delayed from wenty minutes to an hour or more. ne suggested solution is to build nore airports. This course of action vould solve part of the airport congestion problem, at least on a temorary basis, but might do little to educe congestion in the air.

An alternative is to decrease the mount of air space allocated to each plane in the sky. Obviously the atmosphere can physically accommodate more planes, but the collision hazard would be increased.

A third possibility would be to provide better transportation on the ground. The Japanese have proved what many have long believed: high-speed, safe trains can haul thousands of passengers quickly over medium and short distances. It is feasible to operate attractive, frequent, high-speed trains between Washington, Philadelphia, New York and Boston. If all such medium-range transportation were adequately served by rail, airway congestion could be greatly reduced

Better scheduling practices could eliminate some of the crowding. Today it is common practice for competing lines on the San Francisco-New York run to fly in virtual formation: you can use any air line you wish, provided you leave San Francisco at 9:00 A.M. Most airline schedules are dictated by economics; the planes depart when the passengers want to leave. But if there were greater experimentation in differential fares, so that a passenger could save substantially by leaving at a less desirable hour, the traffic could be more evenly distributed.

In an effort to speed traffic (and perhaps to reduce the burdens on the traffic controllers) certain changes were recently made in the Civil Air Regulations. It had been standard practice for commercial air liners to fly "IFR" (in accordance with Instrument Flight Rules), thus operating in clear weather as they would operate in the clouds. In this way they were afforded the protection of airways traffic control, which provides traffic separation for the various planes.

Under the new system, once a pilot sees the airport, he may be cleared to make a visual approach. This means that the pilot himself assumes primary responsibility for watching out for traffic. It is true that he may get some traffic advice from the radar operators on the ground, but the reliability of separation is substantially reduced. Visual approaches are now common even in Los Angeles, where visibility is seriously restricted by haze and smog. Under this system a jet flying from San Francisco to Los Angeles may save a minute or two in landing procedures.

Although major air lines spend thousands of dollars and a good many man-hours training their hostesses in emergency procedures and the use of safety equipment, the training is uneven. Some of the carriers give too little attention to these matters—scanting items that can be critical when a perilous situation arises.

Instead of giving real attention to the adequacy of emergency training and equipment, some (not many!) inspectors content themselves with minutiae. One FAA employee actually devised a scheme whereby regular commuters might spy on the crew, reporting in Gestapo-like fashion whether the cockpit door appeared to be locked and whether the pilot appeared to spend too much time in the galley, the cabin or the lavatory.

The air transportation industry, cooperating with the military, has made impressive studies of the results of airplane crashes, using obsolescent and unmanned planes on high-speed surface tracks. These experiments, scientifically controlled, confirm some hypotheses that accident investigations have developed. Much useful information has been gained, and many safety devices have been invented.

But we have not gone far enough. These investigations clearly demonstrate the need for a well-trained crew and the critical importance of time. If fire breaks out (and there is more than a possibility that it will), ten seconds may make a difference in the number of lives that are saved. High-test gasoline thrown on hot engine wreckage will quickly burst into flame. Time is important. With good equipment, a competent crew may help all on board to survive.

In this respect the jets are much safer because the kerosene they use is less volatile. But the possibility of explosion still remains, and more than one tragedy has occurred from the explosion of kerosene fumes in a near-empty tank. Substantial progress has been made in developing a substance that may one day inhibit the formation of kerosene fumes.

For more than a generation warehouses have been equipped with automatic sprinkler systems to minimize the damage to goods if fire should inadvertently break out. In the middle of the Arizona desert, astute cattlemen have installed overhead sprinklers to ameliorate the effects of the noonday sun on the beasts in their modern feeding pens. But in this age of rockets and space travel, we have not yet developed an automatic system to quench the flames in a plane.

We rely heavily on prosaic safety equipment—extremely common, seldom used, but vital in an emergency. And here the story is sad. On some air lines "safety" equipment is scarcely worthy of the name. Escape chutes are a case in point. These slidelike devices were developed when planes grew so tall that there was danger in jumping from the cabin to the ground. Stowed compactly in the cabin, they can quickly be inflated with the pull of a cord and provide an easy slide to safety—if all goes well.

But in the sixth year of the jet age, these chutes are still not standardized. It is bad enough that some of them are stowed overhead and some are attached to the door. (Valuable seconds may be wasted looking for them in an emergency in the dark.) Even worse, one type of chute requires that the door be opened before the chute is locked into place, but if the door should be opened before another type is affixed, the chute goes helplessly out the door. Some of the overhead chutes are beyond the reach of a small hostess; and if she manages somehow to grasp it, it may knock her to the floor as it falls from its stowed position.

Too few mechanics know anything about chute operation, and far too many chutes are incorrectly installed. Placed upside down (and many are), their usefulness is seriously decreased. On two successive safety demonstrations on a major air line the chutes were improperly installed. In four recent accidents, at least one chute did not work properly.

And even when chutes are in good shape, they are really not good enough. These ingenious slides essentially are inflated balloons. The standard emergency instructions call for all passengers to remove their shoes before using the slides, lest a woman's high heels, or a nail in a sole, puncture the chute. Can one really expect a person to take off his shoes before jumping from a burning plane? Less fragile material is indicated.

Chutes have other limitations. If they are overheated they may explode; if the wind is strong they may blow away; if it is raining they will not permit a passenger to slide. On at least one occasion the inflation hose broke loose and flailed about the cabin, adding to the terror and danger.

Engineering genius has been used in the design of our superb planes but glaring oversights remain. It is still inadvisable to suffer an accident at night!

Now, this may put me in the same bag with the tobacco companies, but it is true that, in scientific discourse at least, a correlation is not, by itself, acceptable evidence of cause-and-effect relationships.

4. Do I miss the point and hang on to old myths? I didn't miss the point that Mr. Callahan underlines. I just don't accept it, and I particularly don't accept the method used to make that point. I do plead guilty to the charge that I cling to the old "myth" that ending discrimination will go a long way toward ending inequality. Of course I don't mean by this that we should pass laws, give them token enforcement, and then say with great wonderment that Negroes still don't seem to make much progress after all we've done for them.

Contrary to press reports, the White House Conference had presented to it literally dozens of proposals by which real equality might be achieved. A few touchy ideas that might be considered are: putting registrars in Georgia even if this might threaten the election of one or more of Mr. Johnson's buddies; decertifying some of Mr. Meany's craft unions that discriminate so blatantly; following through on the de facto issue in the schools of Mr. Daley's Chicago; and taking away urban-renewal money from Mr. Johnson's allies in the big cities if they don't meet requirements for code enforcement and decent relocation.

Surely we ought at least to try out the idea of putting an end to discrimination before we dismiss it as inadequate.

Finally, may I suggest that it is not the business of Moynihans, Callahans and Ryans to tinker with the Negro family. Why don't we put our energies into ending racism and see if then the Negro family is not able to take care of itself? William Ryan

The Rosenberg defense

Northampton, Mass.

Dear Sirs: In his review of Invitation to an Inquest [The Nation, Nov. 15] on the Rosenberg-Sobell case Fred J. Cook states:

> From the first, there were implausibilities that challenged belief but they never had a chance to register with the jury because Emanuel Bloch, the Rosenbergs' attorney, incredibly chose not to challenge a single item of the Gold story.

I followed the Rosenberg-Sobell case closely from the beginning. There was only one trial and until they were in court neither the accused nor their attorneys knew what they were charged with. No honest lawyer challenges evidence until he can prove it false. Bloch did obtain all the evidence to prove the Rosenbergs innocent, but that evidence could never be presented in court because all appeals for a new trial were refused.

Emanuel Bloch literally gave his life for the Rosenbergs and before he died he had seen to it that their children were well provided for. He left nothing undone and to slur his memory is shameful.

lanes were inadequately provided ith internal emergency lights. rue, the pilots carried flashlights, ut those could hardly be considered adequate to guide exiting passengers in a rush. Today there are some emergency lights in the cabins. Designed to operate automatically n the event of impact, they can provide assistance, but not enough. Much emergency equipment is not lighted, and no lights are available o flood the exterior of the plane. The emergency cabin lights are removable and may serve as portable lamps, but even here there is no standardization; at least three types of switches are in use.

Some lines have worked out elaborate procedures for the emergency coordination of the crew. But these assume the presence of the captain and a functioning communications system. They do not take into account that a single broken wire may disable the public-address system, nor that modern jet planes are so well soundproofed that if the captain were to yell at the top of his voice, he could not be heard from one end of the giant plane to the other.

While agents, clerks and baggage handlers on the ground are provided with portable walkie-talkie units, plane crews have no such device for emergencies that may develop in flight. Recognizing at least part of the problem, the FAA has ruled that all flights must carry a megaphone, but even this requirement will not become effective until July, 1966. Jet planes worth $5 million are not yet equipped with pre-recorded tapes that might alert the passengers in the event of certain types of emergencies.

Today, many incidents can occur in a plane without the knowledge of the pilot. A passenger may go berserk; a drunk may become obnoxious; a fire may start in the galley. On one flight, after heavy use of the brakes following a difficult landing, smoke poured from the overheated brake drums. When the plane came to a stop at the end of the runway, the hostess—properly alert—took emergency action. The pilot was completely unaware that she had extended the integral ramp from the tail of the ship and was busily discharging the passengers. Thinking that the plane was on fire, she was "saving" them from nonexistent flames.

These incidents occur because the communications systems are frail, and because the pilot often cannot see what is going on. In one real emergency, a hostess in the rear of the plane made three round-trip tours through the coach compartment, oblivious to the fact that passengers were being evacuated from the forward cabin. Surely closed circuit television could be used to advantage, at least to allow the pilot to scan the interior and exterior of his plane.

In the event of an emergency at sea, life rafts may be of critical importance. Here again there are numerous malfunctions. Some lifeboats will not inflate; some have holes; on some moorings are improperly fastened. These are small mechanical details, but they may be important in saving lives.

Everybody connected with an air line is concerned about safety: operations executives and pilots; maintenance supervisors and hostesses; union officials and others. Many competent men devote their lives to it, but still not enough is being done. At the average air line, no one really has full responsibility for safety. Too often complaints about malfunctioning equipment get snarled up in channels. Too often new, proved safety devices must await installation until the next budget is approved.

Good training and adequate safety devices are expensive, and much money spent in this area will be "wasted." But is this not the case of a policy for fire insurance? Do you not hope that these dollars, too, will be unnecessarily spent?

COPS, GUNS AND HOMICIDES . . . Sol Rubin

The 1960s — or at least the first five years of the decade — will be remembered as a period of serious riots in the Negro ghettos. Many factors underlie these riots, but prominent among them is the relationship of the segregated population to the police. The riots are a more explosive demonstration of, in some places, almost daily incidents of noncooperation, or worse. [See "The Language of Watts" by Stanley Sanders, The Nation, Dec. 20.]

In Los Angeles, a police shotgun figured prominently in the arrest of a traffic violator that precipitated the riot. Guns were used freely in the several days of violence that followed. Of the thirty-four persons killed, thirty-one were Negroes. In Harlem the fatal shooting of a 15-year-old Negro boy by a white police lieutenant brought on the violence. In the few days after July 16, 1964, thousands of rounds were fired by the New York City police in response to rioting and looting.

But it is the everyday use of guns by the police that raises the bigger question. The shooting of a fleeing suspect is a common occurrence, and killings are not infrequent. In many instances off-duty policemen pull the trigger; and police guns are often used in noncriminal situations — quarrels, suicides and accidents. Inevitably innocent bystanders—as well as innocent suspects — have been wounded and killed.

Some moves have been made to control the resort to guns. A New York State Senator has introduced a bill to prevent off-duty policemen from carrying service revolvers. It is a good proposal. Why should not the officer leave his gun in the locker at the station house when he goes off duty? Nor is legislation needed to accomplish this, but only an administrative order by the police commissioner.

If guns were hung up with uniforms, tragedies like the following which occurred in New York would be averted.

- A Bronx youth is fatally shot by an off-duty policeman who says his gun went off accidentally after he was punched outside a neighborhood bar.
- A patrolman shoots and seriously wounds his neighbor, a fellow member of the force, in an argument in which each allegedly attempted to shovel snow onto his neighbor's property.
- An off-duty patrolman fatally shoots a man in a tavern argument. The patrolman says the shooting was accidental.
- A retired police sergeant shoots and kills a peddler after being punched during an argument.

These serious incidents are selected because they have nothing whatsoever to do with law enforcement. It may be noted in this connection that the shooting which set off the Harlem riot was by a police lieutenant who was off duty and who intervened in an argument between an apartment house superintendent and some children.

However, restricting the possession of guns to police officers on duty is not enough. I suggest that the police here, as in England, not carry guns while on ordinary police duty. It is doubtful that the gun protects either the police or the public, or that it controls crime. Certainly it is the cause of needless killings and woundings of civilians, police and criminals. These conclusions stem from a study of typical events that occur in the police work. The following incidents are drawn from reports in the New York press during 1964. They are in no way unusual. Rather, they are typical of occurrences in other cities and at other times.

Shootings related to law enforcement fall into two categories: incidents at close quarters, and those in which the fleeing suspect offers no threat to the officer or anyone else. The second category first:

- An 18-year-old Puerto Rican youth, father of an infant and named Boy of the Year two years before, was shot and killed. He was said to have attacked the off-duty patrolman, in civilian clothes, with a knife and then fled. He was shot when he failed to halt at the officer's command and warning shot. Protests and demonstrations by the Puerto Rican community followed.
- A taxi pulled alongside a patrol car. The cab driver jumped out and shouted that his two passengers —who fled—had taken his money. The police called on them to stop and fired over their heads. When they kept running, the patrolman took aim and killed one of the fugitives.
- A pedestrian was shot and killed on Madison Avenue near 37th Street when a patrolman used his pistol to try to stop a fleeing motorist. The traffic officer had ordered the driver to stop, and reached in to take the ignition keys, but the motorist drove off and the officer ran alongside for one block and was dragged another block with his arm caught. While in this predicament he pulled his gun and fired four times, one shot killing the pedestrian.
- A 23-year-old suspect was seriously wounded by four bullets from the gun of a detective who said the man had struck him and fled after being stopped for questioning. He was not the man who was being sought.
- An 18-year-old youth was shot and killed while fleeing from police who were investigating an alleged burglary attempt.
- A patrolman accidentally shot a bystander in the thigh while pursuing a man who had just robbed a food shop.
- A patrolman approached two men who had been pointed out as men who had just stolen a wallet. When approached, one of the men swung a blackjack at the officer and ran. The patrolman fired two shots, one of them striking the fugitive, the other went through the hat of another patrolman who had been attracted by the sound of shots and was running toward the suspect. He was slightly wounded.

These are not examples of dangerous criminals whose capture must be attempted at all costs lest they commit serious injury to others. In some instances the crime was minor; in others there may have been no crime at all. But even if these were undoubted felons, it would seem more prudent to allow them to escape—as many criminals do anyway—rather than to attempt their capture at the risk of death for criminal, officer or bystander. It is difficult to justify gunfire directed at fleeing men. The police are not expected to be executioners.

There remain the other cases, in which the police officer has cornered an armed suspect, or is at close quarters with him. Whatever questions may be raised about the use of guns in the situations cited above, or about the need for officers to be armed in such situations, surely a gun is needed for the officer's self-defense or to overcome the resistance of armed robbers with the goods?

Two armed men, who within fifteen minutes robbed three stores, were shot down by the police during yet another robbery, one being killed and the other critically wounded. As the robbers entered the store, two patrolmen stepped from the shadows outside the building, moved in behind them and asked for identification. One of the suspects drew a gun and seven shots were exchanged, one of the officers being hit in the hand.

Was this effective police enforcement? Was it desirable police practice? For one thing, it might easily have resulted in the death of one or both of the officers. The desirable result would have been capture of the suspects without shooting.

Such situations offer the best argument for the police gun, but even in these situations, as often as not, there is time for a radio call to headquarters, bringing to the scene a special armed squad trained to handle such affairs — and without shooting if possible.

A study of a national sample of episodes in which police officers had been shot, showed that in approximately three-fourths of the cases the officers knew, or had good reason to believe, that the suspects were armed. More than half of the susects were barricaded and there was no need for impulse activity. But in three-quarters of these cases officers were shot when they rushed the premises without use of special weapons or tear gas. It may well be that possession of a gun leads a police officer to act with needless impetuosity in a dangerous situation; he thus greatly enlarges the danger to himself as well as to the suspect. A reasonable amount of ingenuity and perseverance will apprehend violators without recourse to guns. Furthermore, it is likely that the police pattern in the use of guns tends to generate lawlessness and violence, rather than the opposite. Certainly there is no evidence that crime is being deterred.

In addition, condoning current practice opens the door to abuses. On August 29, 1963, the New York police learned that one of two killers of two New Jersey policemen was in a New York hotel. A lieutenant, a sergeant, two detectives and three patrolmen of the city police department entered his room with a passkey, while he was in bed asleep in his underwear. The New York Times reported: "Although awakened with a revolver pressed to his throat, he fought desperately before being killed by seven bullets. He died snarling at the police and cursing them." Sixteen hours later, the second man surrendered, accompanied by a lawyer. The Civil Liberties Union asked for facts which would dispel the suspicion that the officers may have executed the man in the hotel.

On November 17, 1963, two Puerto Ricans were shot and killed in a police patrol car when they allegedly attempted to break loose as they were being taken to the station house on disorderly conduct charges. One was said to have fired a shot which passed between the two patrolmen in the front seat and lodged in the floor of the car. How, under arrest, did the captives retain a gun? It was explained that they were not searched on the spot because a crowd had gathered. The two officers were in the front, the two captives in the back. The patrolman was stopping the car to search the two men when, he said, one pulled a revolver and fired the shot. The other, police said, grabbed the second officer around the neck from behind, but this officer freed his right arm, pulled his gun and fired two shots at his assailant, then two at the other man who was struggling with the other officer.

The killings were protested by 600 Puerto Rican demonstrators at the police station. Their leaders asked why the patrolman drove to the scene of the shooting, a highway underpass, which was not on the direct route from the site of the arrest to the station house.

A police commissioner's statement condemning the Civil Liberties Union position pointed to the tragic fact that nine New York City officers had been killed in the line of duty since 1961. But the number of policemen killed in all England averages less than one a year.

Presumably the relative safety of British officers is due to the fact that the British criminal is less likely to shoot, or even to be armed. Why should that be so? At least in part it is because the British police are not armed; a criminal facing a British police officer does not fear an assault on his life, and behaves accordingly. Gertrude Samuels, writing on crime and law enforcement in England, referred to a rise there in crimes of violence. But when she asked a constable whether he wanted to be armed he said no; he "explained in tones of pained surprise: 'It isn't safe.'"

Then what reason remains for the American police to carry guns? I can think of only one—the weapon maintains a certain "image" of the police officer. The picture is that of a strong man, one with the power to kill. For many years, every police commissioner in New York has publicly proclaimed to his men and the public that the police must use force. Usually the sentiment has been reiterated by mayor and governor. A police officer who has used his gun is often among those receiving police department citations of honor. Michael Banton, in his recent book on the British and American police, writes: "To the visiting European it appears as if the revolver is the prime symbol of virility: a man without a gun who cannot shoot is a poor creature. When people possess guns there is a standing temptation to use them even when circumstances do not justify their use, and this increases the policeman's burdens considerably."

Police officials talk about, and believe in, good relations with the community. But the image I have just suggested is precisely the one strongly held by the Negro and Puerto Rican community in New York—and is an underlying factor in the riots, and in the attacks on individual policemen that occur from time to time. A study in Philadelphia police records revealed that the average annual rate of Negro and white victims of police guns was 22 to 1. The situation involved by this statistic becomes in itself an incitement to violence.

Learned Hand once said: "If you are able to shoot a robber [are you] less likely to have a robber? I question that. I challenge it altogether. I don't believe that possibility figures at all in the commission of crime." The removal of his gun would go a long way to improving the policeman's image—with greater safety to the citizen and the police officer, and with no loss, with probably a gain, in police efficiency.

Perhaps there is an analogy in the experience of Warden Duffy of San Quentin, who disarmed the guards as one of his reforms. He writes: "To me, guns inside the prison meant a constant show of force, a Damoclean sword dangling over the inmates while they worked, ate and slept. It has taken almost ten years to eliminate most of these threatening rifles, but the upsurge in morale was worth it. . . . There are still riflemen on some of the wallposts, a few strategically located towers, and in the maximum-security sections, but I cannot remember when the last shot was fired."

Joseph Sommers

To most North Americans, nationalism in Mexico evokes the Mexican Revolution of 1910-40, incarnated by such figures as Zapata and Pancho Villa, the great muralists Orozco, Rivera and Siqueiros, and the image of President Cárdenas in the 1930s expropriating American and British oil holdings and distributing land to former peons.

But nationalism in Latin America has many faces and many ideological bases, depending upon time and place. Radical movements for reform and revolution, directed against Yankee imperialism, have traditionally relied upon popular aspirations for national independence and self-determination. Cárdenas and Castro stand as examples. On the other hand, right-wing dictators like Stroessner of Paraguay, aware of nationalism's appeal, constantly evoke chauvinist sentiments of patriotism, glorifying the national past in order to set up political barriers in the present. Nationalism in Paraguay insulates against "foreign" ideologies and influences, whether they stem from Das Kapital or the Alliance for Progress.

A classic instance of reactionary nationalism, complete with openly demagogic anti-yanquismo, was the recent attempt to condemn and to ban officially the Spanish translation of Oscar Lewis' The Children of Sánchez. The attack upon this widely known study of Mexican poverty provides an index of the contradictory climate now prevailing in post-revolutionary times. Twenty-five years after Cárdenas, dominated by the new and powerful middle class which the revolution spawned, a decidedly less radical Mexico today is experiencing a new set of tensions.

The dramatic circumstances of the case and its wide impact in intellectual circles call for an extended study in depth. In a period of forty-six days in February and March of 1965, the editors of the Fondo de Cultura Económica, who had published the authorized translation of The Children of Sánchez, amassed in their files a collection of 583 newspaper articles, commentaries, cartoons and editorials on the controversy. It is to be hoped that Mexican and United States scholars will concern themselves with the broader implications for cultural activity and research. A review here of highlights may serve to challenge the current journalistic trend toward easy generalizations about Latin America.

The translation of Los Hijos de Sánchez was published in August, 1964, and sold out almost immediately. A second printing followed, and also disappeared rapidly from the bookstores.

On February 11, 1965, the Executive Committee of the Mexican Geographical and Statistical Society (MGSS) submitted to the Attorney General of the Republic a list of charges, alleging that the publication of Lewis' study was a criminal act. Citing the penal code, the charges referred to sections covering "social dissolution," defamation and offenses against public morality. They called specifically for a judicial investiga-ion in order to assess proper punishment against the Fondo de Cultura Económica and Oscar Lewis. The MGSS, an old and distinguished society, commands influence in government and political circles which far transcends its apparent concern for geography and statistics. Composed of important figures in government and industry, its program and political positions have consistently supported "official" governmental policies, presumably dedicated to implementing the platform of "institutionalized revolution."

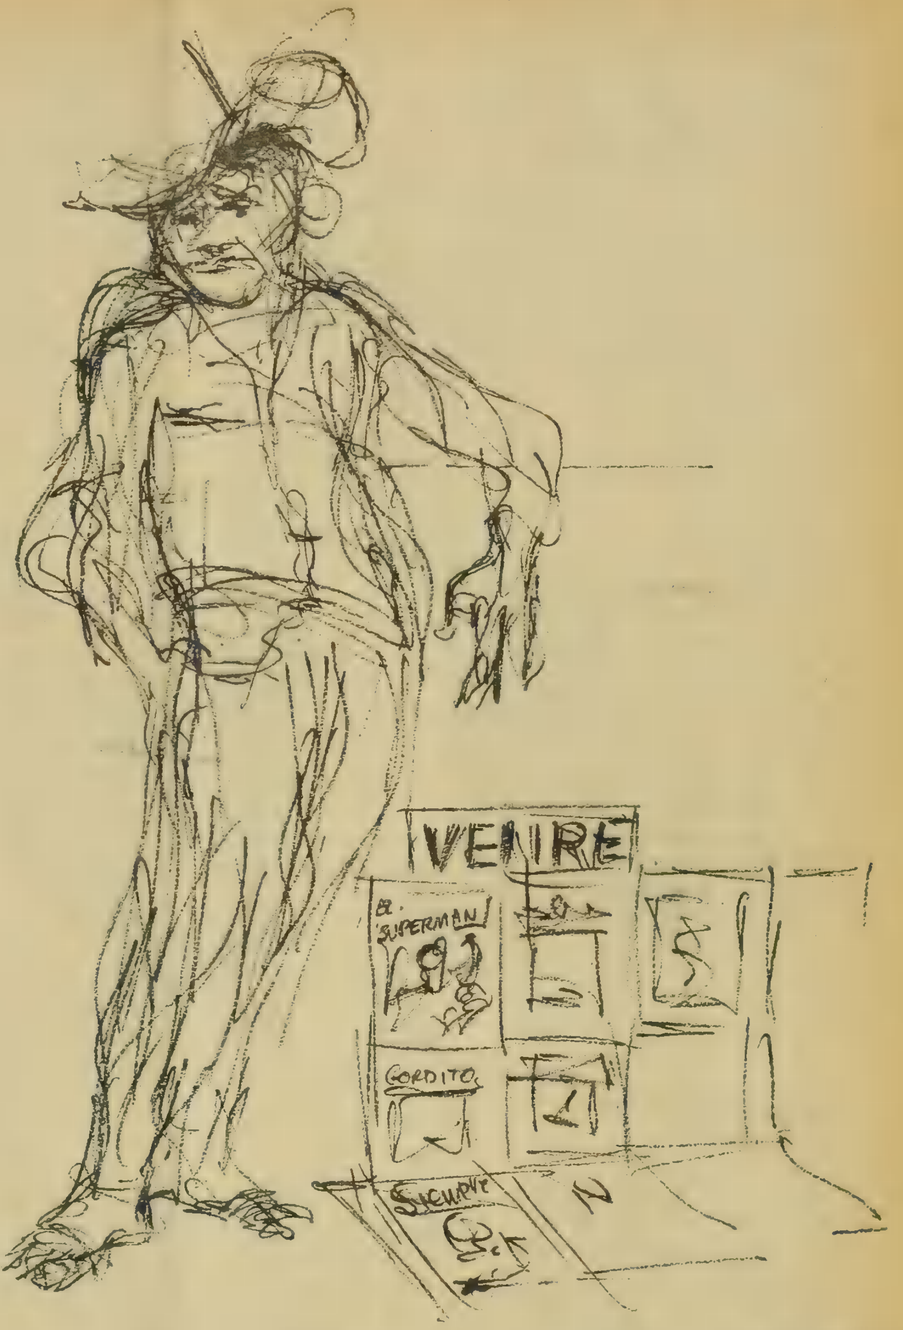
The MGSS officials stated as the basis of their formal charges "the base and obscene language used by the author; the description of improper scenes together with opinions which are slanderous, defamatory and insulting to the people and the government of Mexico." (Translations are my own. Those below from Los Hijos de Sánchez are taken from the Spanish translation as quoted in the actual bill of particulars.) Among the specific passages cited as proof of the charges were the following quotes from members of the Sánchez family: "I'd like to have laws here like those of the United States. There wouldn't be as many scoundrels as we have, and there wouldn't be as much out-and-out thievery." "The Mexican people are going under for lack of leadership, lack of manliness, and because of all the filth that you can see. . . . " "I wish we had an American president here in Mexico." A paragraph from Lewis' own introduction, attributing Mexico's political stability to the capacity of its ordinary citizens to withstand poverty and suffering, was also cited, as was his statement that unless means were found to distribute national wealth more equitably, social upheavals would occur sooner or later.



The widespread discussion which followed in all communication media is interesting partly because of what was not discussed. For example, only rarely was there any reference to the central theme of the Lewis book—the profound impact of poverty upon the personalities and lives of an ordinary Mexican urban family. When poverty was mentioned—usually by someone opposing the charges against the book—it was dealt with as a social ill which the government is now eliminating.

The bulk of published opinion on the controversy expressed opposition to the action of the MGSS. It was an opposition springing more from a desire to protect freedom of expression in the abstract than from a realization that hunger and misery are mass phenomena in Mexico, revolutionary achievements and reforms notwithstanding.

A high point in the formation of public reaction to the case against Los Hijos de Sánchez was the roundtable discussion on March 4 at the National University. Organized to take place in an auditorium with space for 400, the debate attracted an audience of some 700 students, and yielded a significant insight into student opinion. Lone spokesman for the MGSS was its secretary, Luis Cataño Morlet. The society president, Sr. José Domingo Lavín, scheduled to appear, sent a last-minute message. Under the impression that Oscar Lewis would be present, Lavín refused to share the same platform with such a delincuente (roughly, lawbreaker).

Last spring, when Harold Barnell was planning his trip to Mexico, The Nation suggested that he visit the neighborhood in Mexico City where the Sánchez family lived when Oscar Lewis studied them. The sketches on these pages are from the portfolio which Mr. Barnell compiled on that assignment.

Mr. Barnell reports that, although the Mexican Government has tried to do a great deal to improve the situation in the city's slums, the public programs too often do not mesh with the needs of the people. For example, new housing is pushed on an impressive scale, but the rents are too high; a project near the Sánchez area was 80 per cent empty when Barnell visited it. Similarly, municipal markets are not patronized and new schools, which are free but not compulsory do not enroll children who are needed to earn food money.

The remarks of Cataño Morlet, calculated to appeal to well known anti-gringo sentiments of the university students, failed completely. When he stated that he would not quote defamatory passages from Los Hijos de Sánchez because there were women present, he was subjected to catcalls of derision. Attempting to illustrate how some Mexicans sacrifice national pride for U.S. dollars, he then asserted that the braceros who go north to work in Texas and California are lacking in patriotism. The response was laughter mixed with hoots of scorn. A student shouted, "They go because they're hungry," and received a round of applause.

Contrasting in intellectual tone were the comments of three spokesmen who defended publication of the book. Ricardo Pozas, anthropologist and university professor, while disagreeing with the Lewis methodology, praised the scope of his endeavor and called for new and more scientific works along the same lines. In one of the few references to subject matter, he asserted that there are population sectors in Mexico subsisting on a much lower economic level than that of the Sánchez family, and cited certain Indian groups. Rosario Castellanos, widely respected novelist, poet and literary critic, read a prepared te which discussed seriously the academic importance of freedom of speec and the press. The broad implication of her comments reflected the concer of many intellectuals. If the Lew book were banned, the next attac might well be directed at many contemporary novels. In indirect but meaningful terms, the social and historica cast of the novels written by Carlo Fuentes, Juan Rulfo, Sergio Galind and Rosario Castellanos herself frequently convey a more sweeping indictment of Mexican values and more than the sharply focused work o Oscar Lewis.

Third speaker for the defense wa Francisco López Cámara, professor i the university's School of Politica Science. Aside from demolishing th logic, or absence thereof, in the arguments of Cataño Morlet, López Cámara read to the audience a notarize affidavit from a member of the actual Sánchez family. Lewis had bee accused in the press both of exploiting the family financially and of distorting their statements. The affidavit attesting to the author's good fait on both counts, helped dissolve a secondary but inflammatory argumen which had made the rounds on th gossip levels.

Student response was overwhelmingly on the side of the free currenc of ideas, and against false and emotional pseudo-patriotism. This example of maturity is worth noting, sinc the uniform image of the Latin American student in the U.S. press is precisely contrary.

On March 29, 1965, charges agains Lewis and the publishers were throw out of court, the attorney general' statement explicitly denying any "subversive" qualities in the book. A salutory precedent for freedom of the pres in Mexico was established.

However, analysis of the current underlying the case, and of the aftermath of this apparently clean-cut victory indicate many unresolved complexities.

At this writing, some eight month after the ruling, there has not been third edition of Los Hijos de Sánchez Also, it is now definite that th Fondo de Cultura Económica, a government-subsidized institution, wil not publish the new edition. A privat company, Editorial Joaquín Mortiz has acquired the rights, thus permitting the government to avoid any further embarrassment.

A project to produce a motion picture based on the Lewis book lies still born. In late 1962, plans were announced for the film by Carlo Ponti, the renowned Italian producer, who arrived in Mexico prepared for a major undertaking. Sophia Loren, his wife, was to play a leading role. Carlos Fuentes and Abby Mann were contracted to write the script. When first plans were submitted to the government, which approves all scripts, it became clear that a combination of resistance and bureaucratic entanglement implied a hopeless future. As of now, with producers, writers, technicians and actors scattered in four countries, chances of resuming production are minimal.

Finally, it remains to be seen whether Pedro Martínez, the most recent Lewis publication, will see the light of day in Spanish translation. Delving as it does into an example of poverty and frustration in rural Mexico, it touches an even more sensitive political nerve than did The Children of Sánchez. Most political observers agree that peasant dissatisfaction is the most grievous problem facing the "institutionalized revolution" today.

One significant question for interested Americans which must arise from a post-mortem analysis of the controversy is the following: if, in the most politically stable country in Latin America, the nation with the most solid achievements and traditions of reform, repression of ideas in the name of nationalism can gain such important support, what are the prospects for meaningful research and exchange of ideas in, say, Brazil, Argentina or Guatemala?

A second question is suggested by the nature of the victory itself. Young Mexican intellectuals apparently reject false new applications of a nationalism which in the past was constructive, but in the present is clearly ambivalent. Recognizing the revolution's validity as a historical phenomenon, they nevertheless scorn the most extreme of its current standard wavers.

Many of Mr. Lewis' most outspoken defenders (writers like Juan Rulfo, Carlos Fuentes, Salvador Novo, Rosario Castellanos; academicians such as Daniel Moreno, López Cámara, Emilio Uranga, Victor Flores Olea, Ricardo Pozas, Ramón de Ertze Garimendi, Henrique González Casanova; journalists including Rubén Salazar Mallén, Emmanuel Carballo, Roberto Blanco Moheno, Gastón García Cantú and Jaime García Terrés) are those in Mexico who have deep questions and criticisms concerning the role of the United States in Latin America. Are we as willing to hear and to publish their ideas as they have been to defend the right of a United States scholar to be published in Mexico?

Joseph Sommers, assistant professor of Romance Languages at the University of Washington, is spending a year studying the contemporary Mexican novel under a grant of the Social Science Research Council and the American Council of Learned Societies.

The Good Grief

Jessica Mitford

In recent years the American death industries (to whose door we must all eventually beat a path) have cleverly invented a new and better mousetrap—the concept of "grief therapy." This phrase, with its plausible psychiatric overtones, is used to sell all manner of merchandise at fantastic markups. Grief therapy works like this: the finer and costlier the casket, the more therapeutic for the bereaved. The public "viewing" of the embalmed and restored corpse is a key part of the therapy. Funeral flowers, the florists tell us, are therapeutic. So are elaborate headstones and everlastingly secure vaults, say the monument makers and vault men.

To confer learned authority on these profitable contentions the National Funeral Directors Association has developed a stable of writers and lecturers with dubious titles like "pastoral psychologist" whose task it is to bolster the sagging image of the contemporary American funeral. I heard one of these tell an audience of Midwest college students that a person who is stingy in his purchase of a casket for a deceased relative is likely to be suffering from "anal-regressive tendencies." Books and pamphlets sponsored by the trade stress the same idea. Dr. Edgar N. Jackson, whose book For the Living was distributed free to 100,000 clergymen by the National Funeral Directors Association, says: "If we make any part of man's experience cheap we cheapen all the rest of it." To the charge that expensive funerals are a waste of money, he answers: "It is like saying that it is a waste of money for a bride to spend all that money on a beautiful white dress that she will never wear again."

Having waded through formidable stacks of similar nonsense while writing The American Way of Death, and having found very little in the way of scholarly discourse on bereavement, grief and mourning, I find Geoffrey Gorer's book particularly welcome. While I disagree with his conclusions, it is nevertheless the most thoughtful text I have seen on the subject, written in proper English rather than the jargon of sociology or the terrible lowest-common-denominator prose of the undertakers' grief therapists.

Mr. Gorer descries radical changes in English mourning customs over the last fifty years. He believes that the modern tendency to discard all mourning ritual, combined with English stiff-upper-lipism in the face of personal tragedy, is costing heavily in mental distress and maladaptive behavior of bereaved persons. In his preface to the American edition, he says: "The main theme of the book, the social denial and the individual repudiation of mourning is, I believe, as apposite to the majority of the inhabitants of the United States as it is to the majority of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom."

The chief difference, in fact, between death customs in the two countries seems to center on the funeral itself. "I found no analogue in Britain to the beautifying and rejuvenating of the corpse, and embalming still seems to be a very uncommon practice." Funeral costs in England (he says) are not a problem even to the very poor, those living on old-age pensions or National Assistance: "The display and expense of a 'lovely funeral' seem to be completely things of the past." Unlike in America, where the undertakers have arrogated to themselves the role of guide and counselor to the family in all that concerns the funeral, in England their role is minimal, and Mr. Gorer mentions them only in passing. He does, however, give a rather endearing description of two ex-nurses sent by the undertaker to lay out the body of his brother: "They imparted a somewhat Dickensian tone; they were fat and jolly, and asked in a respectful but cheerful tone, 'Where is the patient?' . . . I gave them a pound for their pains; the leader, pure Sarah Gamp, said 'That for us, duck? Cheers!' and went through the motions of raising a bottle and emptying it into her mouth."

The Gorer study is based on interviews with several hundred English people who had recently suffered a death in the family. They were closely questioned about their religious beliefs, the duration of their mourning and the forms it took, the effect of bereavement on their health, the behavior of friends and relations toward them during the period of mourning. Religious belief is on the wane in England; only 49 per cent of his sample believed in the afterlife. Of those who do, only the Orthodox Jews and Roman Catholics follow a specified ritual of mourning; Mr. Gorer (himself an atheist) is inclined to think that bereaved persons of these sects fare better because of the concentrated, overt mourning prescribed by traditions of their religion.

The most vivid and moving part of the book is Mr. Gorer's autobiographical introduction, in which he describes his own early experiences with death and mourning, and contrasts the customs as he recalls them fifty years ago with those of today.

In 1915, when he was 10 years old and away at prep school, his father was drowned in the sinking of the Lusitania. "I was treated with great kindness, but like an invalid; no demands were made on me, I was indulged, conversation was hushed in my presence." His mother came down to see him, "a tragic, almost frightening figure in the full panoply of widow's weeds and unrelieved black, a crepe veil shrouding her (when it was not lifted) so that she was visibly withdrawn from the world." She continued to wear mourning, modifying it at the proper calendrical moments by shortening the veil or adding a touch of white, for the customary two years: "It would have been unthinkable at that date for a respectable woman to do otherwise."

After World War I, English mourning customs underwent a radical change. Perhaps because all England was in mourning for the war dead, black arm bands and widow's weeds went out of fashion; no longer was the mourner distinguished and set apart by his clothing as a person in a special situation. When Mr. Gorer's brother died in 1961, the widow "did not wear black clothes nor ritualize her mourning in any way; she let herself be, almost literally, eaten up with grief, sinking into a deep and long-lasting depression." The attitude of family friends was one of embarrassed evasion. When Mr. Gorer declined an invitation to a cocktail party, explaining that he was in mourning, the response was "shocked embarrassment, as if I had voiced some appalling obscenity." The widow was treated as though she were a leper. "Only if she acted as though nothing of consequence had happened was she again socially acceptable."

The conclusions that Mr. Gorer draws from these experiences and from the extensive interviews seem to me to be farfetched and unsupported by his own research. For example, he links the campaigns against smoking and against nuclear war to a general tendency to deny the reality of death. To replace the vanished mourning customs of the early part of the century he suggests establishing a secular mourning ritual—something analogous to civil marriage. Such an effort to regiment the behavior of mourners with artificial rules would surely be doomed to failure; no amount of invented ceremony would overcome the appalling mixture of embarrassment, false reticence and callousness that Mr. Gorer met with when his brother died.

Like American undertakers (although obviously not for their reasons) he seeks a solution in terms of ceremonial procedures and outward trappings. Yet one would expect that his experiences would lead him to the opposite view. Was the important element in his own mourning for his father the fact that his mother wore widow's weeds, or was it rather the compassionate attitude toward him of schoolmasters and schoolmates? Did his brother's widow suffer so bitterly because she did not wear black, or because her friends shunned her company? Do Orthodox Jews adjust better to bereavement because of the ritual shaving of heads and rending of clothes, or because their tradition encourages them to weep freely and includes the gathering of friends to help and comfort the grieving family?

From my own observation, individual reactions to a death in the family are as varied as human nature itself —and so are ideas of appropriate expressions of mourning. The latter can range all the way from elaborately ritualized religious services to throwing a bash in memory of the deceased. (I know one family that actually did this; and while it seemed awfully peculiar to me, they apparently found it comforting.)

Freedom of choice (not easily come by in America because of the stranglehold of undertakers on our funeral customs), flexibility, and above all the ordinary human kindness of friends would seem to be what is called for when there is a death in the family. For those inclined to this view I recommend Ernest Morgan's Manual of Simple Burial, obtainable from Celo Press, Burnsville, N.C.

No Man's Land

Paul F. Semonin

When Albert Memmi's The Colonizer and the Colonized first appeared in 1957 during the Algerian War, a number of French critics applauded the author's restraint. In the introduction Jean Paul Sartre classed the work among the "passionate geometries," for "its calm objectivity represents a transcendence of suffering and anger." Being a Tunisian-born Jew, Memmi belonged neither to the world of the colonizer nor to that of the colonized. He was, the critics felt, eminently qualified to diagnose the ills of colonial society objectively.

Memmi's "impartiality," more than the French are likely to admit, stems to a great extent from his experience with "assimilation," the liberal notion underlying what the French described as their "civilizing mission" in the colonies. As an "intellectual" Memmi was schooled in the universalist philosophy of the French democratic tradition. He felt most at ease in his early years with the philosophy professors in Tunis, the "colonizers of good will," as he calls them, who were among the chief propagators of the doctrine of assimilation. Eventually their political ineffectiveness became unacceptable to him. Writing about the period before the Algerian War, he says, "it became clear to me that a real life for a cultured man was impossible in North Africa at that time." The poverty of the colonized floated like an iceberg in the sea of democratic ideals, so Memmi had to explain to himself why the hope of "equality" and social justice through assimilation was in vain.

A note of regret lingers, therefore, when Memmi says his book was "born out of a reflection of an accepted failure." His motive for writing the book was admittedly very personal. "I undertook this inventory of conditions of colonized people mainly in order to understand myself and to identify my place in the society of other men." He makes the inventory, however, with the hand of a logician. The personal intensity yields quickly to a general tone reminiscent of the philosophers in Tunis. It is not a book of protest nor a search for solutions, Memmi assures us, but rather an "affidavit," not to be confused with the "'sentimental projections or demagogic deceits on which politicians too frequently rely." Why does the author choose to elevate his argument to the plane of rational discourse? Who read legal briefs in the colonies? One finds the answer in Memmi's personal experience. His audience was not the fellah or even the revolutionary Arab intellectual but the "colonizer of good will," the original source of his regret.

Being stranded in the no man's land, between the colonizer and the colonized, Memmi's view of colonial society has a predictable symmetry. The plan is simply to "reproduce completely and authentically the portraits of the two protagonists of the colonial drama." He views the colonizer and the colonized as the two extremes, dialectically opposed, yet bound together by the perverse logic of the colonial situation. Contrary to the colonizer's wish, the racial order is rife with contradictions. The essential contradiction lies in the inability of the colonizer to eliminate the colonized. He can go only so far as to impoverish the colonized and subject him to racial contempt because, in the final analysis, the settler's own ego and well-being depend entirely on the subhuman existence of the colonized. "If the colonized is eliminated, the colony becomes a country like any other, and who then will be exploited?" In a country where extermination eliminated the "Indian problem" and assimilation of the Negro has failed, Memmi's point has impact.

The colonizer is portrayed as a Nero, the typical model of a usurper in Memmi's eyes. "Accepting the reality of being a colonizer means agreeing to be a non-legitimate, privileged person, that is, a usurper." In the colonizer's portrait Memmi touches other deviant types: the "leftist colonizer," for example, who rejects colonization but generally either leaves the colony or is cowed into silence by his powerlessness. His discussion of the European Left's response to the colonial situation, however, suffers from an excruciating brevity and a superficial grasp of doctrinal questions involved. The dominant features of the colonizer's portrait remain those of the pied noir or settler, whose mediocrity and racism set the tone of the colony and control the local power structure. "Racism sums up and symbolizes the fundamental relation which unites the colonialist and the colonized." A cycle of oppression and justification perpetuates the settler's racism. Poverty reinforces the image of inferiority in the eyes of both the colonizer and the colonized.

Memmi is projecting the perversity of this situation on to the conscience of the colonizer. "It is impossible for him," says Memmi, "not to be aware of the constant illegitimacy of his status." Surely Memmi exaggerates the moral consciousness of the colonizer but, more important, he fails to emphasize or analyze adequately the other forces underlying the colonizer's attitudes. The moral question of legitimacy prevails too easily over material circumstances. One feels Memmi has lost sight of the latter altogether when, speaking of the colonizer, he concludes: "But what privileges, what material advantages are worth the loss of his soul? In short, if the colonial adventure is seriously damaging for the colonized, it cannot but be unprofitable for the colonizer."

A certain deference to the colonizer persists too in Memmi's portrait of the colonized. He begins with a "mythical portrait of the colonized," the image of the lazy, irrational thief common to all racist ideology. Although Memmi debunks the colonizer's logic, an obsession with the negative image of the colonized thoroughly colors the portrait. "Everything in the colonized is deficient, and everything contributes to this deficiency." Or similarly, "the body and face of the colonized are not a pretty sight." He recalls stopping in a crowd of poor Tunisians: "I looked uneasily for a non-diseased glance on which to rest my own." One looks in vain for an image of their dignity. Memmi readily agrees that only revolt dignifies the colonized but he fails to develop a positive image of their refusal. The negative moment of revolt, says Memmi, gives birth to a mythical portrait too. The colonized becomes a xenophobe and racist himself while defending his own dignity. Like the colonizer, he accepts a Manichaean division of the world. "In order to witness the colonized's complete cure," Memmi says, "his alienation must completely cease. We must await the complete disappearance of colonization—including the period of revolt."

Ultimately, the symmetry of Memmi's analysis is misleading, for it underemphasizes the most essential aspect of colonialism. The portrait of the colonizer in Paris is missing from Memmi's gallery. Although he notes in passing that "the colonial privileges are a function of the Mother country and its citizens," there is no full portrayal of the French military, the colonial administrator or the metropolitan businessman. Colonialism, like segregation in the South, required the compliance of the liberal establishment or central government. Memmi's attitude toward the role of the French in colonization reveals the underlying weakness of his argument: "Let us put aside the problem of initial responsibility for colonization. Was it the result of capitalistic expansion or an accidental venture by voracious businessmen? In the final analysis, all that is not important. What does count is the present reality of colonization and the colonized." Anyone who tries to explain the colonial reality while eschewing capitalistic expansion certainly begs the question.

A wholesale criticism of Memmi's dubious "impartiality" or his indulgence of the "colonizer of good will" is unfair. The book was published at a critical moment during the Algerian conflict, when even a patronizing analysis of the situation was a blow to the colonialists. However, it comes to America eight years later, when the redneck white supremacist is on

Myth: Mantle

My brother I must prick my finger every minute on these sticking needles to make your coat; or you go forever to live in the white bird.
But I am tired, and the whole coat hurts my arms with its weight and sharpness as it drags me, as I add another stitch, collar, one arm done.
Why you're so big, when my arms ache,
I will never finish it. Or would you have,
would you like one wing to half-fly sometimes, or sweep the ground as you walk, one white broad sweep or wing left, wouldn't you have that?
So not to forget it all.

the run and the bandwagon of the Great Society rolls through the South carrying everyone from priests to investigators. Memmi's views, therefore, are likely to be more popular than revealing. The American Negro is colonized, as the dedication of the American edition of Memmi's book tells us, but the dialectics of racial domination in this country now are far more complex than the geometry of his book suggests.

LETTER from POLAND

Maria Kuncewicz

One of the first long words that struck my ear in my father's house, when the century was as young as myself, sounded particularly odd: païdocracy. I asked him what it meant and, obviously embarrassed, he said, "Oh, it's when children imagine they can rule the country." The scene was Warsaw, 1905, the time of the Polish students' strike against the Russian-language school system imposed by the Czarist regime. My father, a teacher, went all the way with the movement till its eventual triumph over the enemy administration, but he felt uneasy about youth's being asked to shoulder political responsibilities.

The incident often comes back to me as the involvement of the present-day youth in world politics becomes more and more pronounced in the United States. During my long stay in Poland in 1964-65, I had many opportunities to speak to children in their classrooms, university students in their clubs, and my own young relations in their homes. And often it occurred to me that, were my father still alive, this time he would be embarrassed not so much by its problematic value, as by the total absence of païdocracy in his country.

Just as it had been when I reached school age, education now is Polish; what is more, it is free at all levels, with the state further helping the scholars by running hotels and cafeterias where they can live and eat at a nominal price. The society, however, in which they move, as well as the political sphere outside their immediate reach, remains full of conflict. Yet they do not seem eager to join in the adult world's antinomies and struggles.

This is a new development in Polish history: something the rebellious ancestors would contemplate with amazement and misgiving. All through the 19th century and well into the present one, Polish students fed their elders uncomfortable ideas and belligerent attitudes. Disregarding harassment and reprisals, they conspired, they plotted, they led processions and demonstrations in defense of various national and social causes. They fought desperate guerrilla wars against the forces of the three Imperial Majesties responsible for partition. Within the nation, they represented the spirit of protest and the taste for romantic pathos.

The part which Polish academic youth and the school boys and girls played during the Second World War, in the underground movement and the 1944 Warsaw rising, is recorded on too many gravestones. On All Souls' Day, year by year, flames flicker, kindled by mothers, as far as the eye can reach at the Powazki cemetery, and childish faces look at passers-by from photographs set into marble and granite and bearing the inscription: "So and so, a boy scout, a student, a girl guide, died gloriously for his or her country."

Against such a background I was surprised to hear a budding producer at the Warsaw School of Dramatic Art say: "You ask me what is the young generation's ambition in Poland now. It would be easier to tell what is not our ambition. We do not want to be heroes. Neither do we want to be sacrificial lambs. Look at the Danes. They specialize in butter, and are left alone. With no bang and a bit of luck, we might specialize in art." The fact that a young Pole should choose, for a comparison with his country, Denmark and not one of the great powers in Europe seems a tremendous departure from the mentality of the unrealistic youth of prewar days.

What is the reason for such a drastic change? Besides the natural weariness of the nation after the immense bloodshed and material ruin of World War II, I think that social revolution can be held responsible for the sober mood. Heroes, prophets and lambs of the past were mostly the offspring of the intelligentsia, a class of impoverished country gentlemen turned urbanites. Their philosophy, if any, was a mixture of romantic idealism and national vainglory. Today, schools are filled with the sons and daughters of workers and peasants whom a long tradition of poverty and degradation made impervious to illusion. Once the Communist state had assumed the role of defender of the Marxist faith, those boys and girls — as they profit by free schooling — seem to wash their hands of politics and doctrines. Let the adult politicians play the risky game; we want cars, intellectual cafés, television, hot jazz and sophisticated art, everything our elders could not enjoy in their miserable past.

Without being spiritless, this kind of attitude narrows the field of ambition almost completely to its economic aspects. I do not call it spiritless because, in modern life, economy engages so much scientific and artistic talent, and the young producer who dreams about Poland's specializing in the export of fine arts, also thinks in economic terms. The Chopin Competition held in Warsaw every five years is considered by the young to be an international market for pianists. The same applies to the annual festival, the Warsaw Autumn, which tends to become a showcase for avant-garde music. Film industry, architecture, the theatre, abstract painting, mathematics, sociology, etc., are so many tools of economic progress in the hands of the upcoming scientists and artists. Polish students are prepared to fight against censorship, the claustrophobia of party bureaucrats and the low standard of living, but the great moral ideals leave them cold—a disposition only slightly affected by the zeal of the Catholic intellectual elite as well as by a group of Communist humanitarians.

In Poznan, where I was asked to read some of my recent writings in a big university students' club, question time expanded into a three-hour conversation with an audience of some 200 young people. But the questions were aimed less at the secrets of a literary workshop than at my experience as teacher at the University of Chicago. America to them is the land of supreme technical achievement and fabulous wealth. They are curious about how such results can be achieved, what is a student's curriculum, and what makes him tick. They seem to go along with the American youth as far as the practical objectives are concerned, but as soon as I mentioned the Peace Corps, pacifism and the Rights of Man, they responded with incredulous smiles and condescending shrugs. "Americans have no historical sense" — a girl wound up the discussion.

This left me with the unsolved problem: which is worse, too much historic sense, which leads to skepticism where political means are used for moral betterment; or too little of it, where wealthy philanthropists are trying to help those who fight for a chance to help themselves. Since in Europe history was transformed into one endless lesson of cynicism, while in America public morality has been for too long a matter of hypocrisy, in both cases former generations seem equally at fault.

During a debate on romanticism, one of my Chicago students, a New Yorker, declared that he was not prepared to die for New York, but he would certainly die for the American way of life. Polish students are now averse to dying for any way of life, be it national, regional or Communist. They have simply ceased to believe that a way of life can be exported, enforced or defended against the evolutionary processes of time.

THE COUNTRY WIFE

Shall we be grateful to the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center for having produced Wycherley's The Country Wife as its second offering of the season? I am rather inclined to think so, despite the heavy burden of the production's faults. For The Country Wife is a masterpiece, champagne of English late 17th-century jest.

Unless you were present in 1936 to see Ruth Gordon's performance in the comedy (I was not), or Julie Harris' in 1957, you could not have seen the play at all, for it is rarely given even in England. Ruth Gordon is said to have been delightful in the role of Mrs. Pinchwife, the lively and candid country girl happily seduced by Mr. Horner, a London rake who is the greater moral menace for having let it be rumored that he is impotent.

For all the excellence of the cast in which Julie Harris appeared with Laurence Harvey and Pamela Brown, that production failed to come alive. Nor does the present one at Lincoln Center. But somehow we do get a sense of the play's natural vigor beneath the shimmering surface. One is not often provoked to laughter—long sections of the play fall flat—but the audience is at least made aware of the reasons for laughter!

It is too early to say what the new company at the Lincoln Center can do well, but its failure with The Country Wife cannot be the subject for condemnation. The play's style is no easy one to capture even by an expert English company. While Wycherley's play undoubtedly mirrors the mode or essential tone of Restoration high society and is in that sense "realistic," its artistic character is hardly that. Not only was life itself a game among the fashionable folk under Charles II, but art—particularly the theatre—became a further refinement, a brittle stylization of what to begin with aspired to artifice. The Restoration stage was an exquisite falsification of a reality which aimed at the "false," the un*natural*. Looking at the period drawings in the Repertory Theater program, one gets a vivid sense of the ideal projected by the court and courtesans of the time. The lewd postures and gestures of the figures are rendered as baroque arabesques in finery, foliage and anatomical fantasy more rarified than robust. It is as if participants in an orgy proposed to cut elegant patterns for a dainty etching of the occasion. It is a mixture of fun and finesse, sensuality whittled to a fine point of irony, high-spirited leer and depreciating grace. It is the metaphor of a haughtily smiling self-consciousness.

That is not at all in the vein of our day. Certainly it has no relation to the company which now plays The Country Wife at the Vivian Beaumont Theater, a company which may be called anything but airy or carefree. It is both too young and too old for such dispassionate frivolity. Accord with or practice in the Theatre of the Absurd is hardly preparation for the humors of Restoration licentiousness That genre was glassily wicked; our counterparts are bitter and tormented heavy with grim mockery.

So we get a production on West 65 Street which, because the text itself is informed with brilliant verve and is dramatically sturdy, has a few merry moments. The actors are sufficiently energetic; they pound away at all the points with enough intelligence, if not with ease, for all of the play to be heard and, at least theoretically, appreciated. It is wide of the mark to say that they do no speak well; their spirit, not to mention their skill, is alien to the material. Yet I venture to suggest with some trepidation that if you hav never seen the play you may still take pleasure in seeing it now—you are not likely to have another opportunity for a long time to come.

All this raises important questions: should such a company choose to do this play in view of its technical and environmental lack of aptitude for it? What sort of plays should a repertory theatre, housed as lavishly and auspiciously as the one at Lincoln Center, produce? There is a trend of opinion in certain critical circles which would unhesitatingly respond — "masterpieces!" Masterpieces of dramatic literature of which The Country Wife is no doubt an example. But this answer—like its more modest (and ambiguous) equivalent, "good plays"—seems to me to take little account of the theatre's special nature. The theatre is not a vehicle for the delivery of fine literature; it is the art of making meaning from the concordance of text, actors and audience at a particular time and place. When such a fortunate conjunction occurs a lesser text often will possess richer substance than a masterpiece done at the wrong time and/or place by the wrong group of people for the wrong audience.

These crucial considerations constitute a problem I hope to probe when the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center has completed its first season!

THE UNDERGROUND RENAISSANCE

With the advent of discotheques and drag Superstars, with the hyper-publicizing of Camp, the glamour of Underground Cinema, at least for the poor little rich girls and their magazines—and even for most film people—faded. The avant-garde is always a tough row to hoe: how long could it have been fun to trek around downtown, following the film makers in their bedraggled search for the Promised Land? How many ill-conceived, half-baked, technically incompetent, faggoty, poetic films can anyone see before announcing: "I've made that scene. And never mind about the art form of the age."

The Underground, which can be dated from the founding of Film Culture ten years ago, or from the exposition of New American Cinema at Spoleto five years ago, has produced a little good work and a few substantial directors: Kenneth Anger, Stan Brakhage, Robert Breer, Bruce Connor, the brothers Kuchar, Jonas Mekas, Jack Smith, Stan Vanderbeek, Andy Warhol and a few others, including Gregory . Markopolous, who does not consider himself Underground.

Yet, as Pauline Kael said with such grace: "The underground cinema is largely a fabrication of publicity . . . parodies of Maria Montez movies, Andy Warhol spoofs of experimentation and variants of exploitation films."

The Museum of Modern Art, under the progressive leadership of the new Film Libary head, Willard Van Dyke, offered a weeklong exhibition of underground classics last month. However, the tone of the museum's seminar on the Underground matched Miss Kael's for pious disapproval of the dimly perceived. Judith Crist and Susan Sontag scratched at each other and alternately faint-praised and belittled the Underground. Robert Osborn, cartoonist, said he had seen more exciting stuff in Paris decades ago.

Osborn's comment is almost perceptive. Independent films have changed so little in the past forty years because film makers are, literally, still working in the silent era. Sound equipment rents for $100 a day; a moviola costs $12 a day. Plus lighting, processing, sound transfer, mixing, and so on. A rule of thumb for industrial film production figures a budget at $1,000 per minute of finished film. So that even with foundation grants of as much as $10,000—the sum the Ford Foundation gave to each of twelve film makers last year—sound is barely feasible. As a consequence, the most exciting Underground work is done in animation, frame by frame, no crew, little unused footage. Live-action film poems have moments in the Underground, but cutting and photography, except for Ed Emshwiller, are not Underground strong points. At one stage, Andy Warhol had developed the perfect solution to the Underground dilemma by never moving his camera, never cutting—that is, Warhol made the most of the most primitive conditions: he did as little as possible.

If the Underground film makers have thus made a virtue of technical incompetence, who can blame them? "Any sophomore with a pencil," says one Undergrounder, explaining why we must be patient, "can write poetry. Some day everyone will learn to express themselves with a camera. But it may take a hundred years or so!"

In the meantime, enter John Brockman, who has managed the Underground headquarters, the Filmmakers' Cinematheque, for the past three months. Brockman may be the only entrepreneur now on the art scene with a master's degree in business from Columbia. His father, a proper Bostonian, once cornered the New England gladiolus market, and Brockman fils in his three-piece suit and wing-tipped shoes looks like nothing so much as the Underground's answer to Joseph Levine. Brockman was once assistant china buyer at Bloomingdale's and is still involved in A and B Leasing Corporation, which arranges cash-flow deals for rich people. He is involved in the Underground because it is an enterprise, an opportunity, a chance to wheel and deal and make something work. And after all proper credit is given to Jonas Mekas, who has fought for and led the Underground all these many years, whatever the new renaissance brings—and there's a chance of big money from you know where—it will be in large part due to the opportunistic arrival of Brockman.

In Brockman, for the first time, the Underground is represented and organized by someone with business sense. He has tried to eliminate bohemian sloppiness, clubhouse paranoia and avant-garde incest. Shows at the Cinematheque now start on time. They are properly projected. Film makers are admitted free, but everyone else must have a Cinematheque membership or pay. The press is kept well informed. And a new, one hopes permanent home, one which is truly underground, has been found at 120 West 41 Street in New York. It is convenient, neat and comfortable. Even the lobby soft-drink machines work.

Further, Brockman has already earned a page in cinema history by explaining that the Underground film makers are not, after all, making movies. Whereas Mekas has consistently refused to acknowledge the constraints of necessity, Brockman says, straight out: "The Underground film makers are artists. And they happen to use film. But they are not even trying to duplicate Hollywood. Film is just the most appropriate medium for what they want to say."

Brockman documented his understanding of the new possibilities with the November-long Expanded Cinema Festival which featured a couple dozen experiments with multiple projections and with film-plus-live-action. Of the pieces of expanded cinema that I saw, the following remain with me (experiments can never be adequately described; as spectacles they are frequently boring even when their ideas are intriguing):

¶ Don Snyder's psychedelic film-plus-slide show which beamed sometimes hallucinogenic, sometimes "optical" images onto a translucent net screen in front of a screen wall made of whitewashed cardboard boxes which black vinyl clad dancers built and dismantled, sometimes waving the boxes to catch and disperse the images. All this was in front of a shredded or venetian-blind screen. Many levels; very beautiful.

¶ Arthur Sainer's film-loop which, in hyphenated form, showed action which was spelled out in greater, if not complete, lucidity by actors and a dancer on stage. This idea of a double level, of film-mimicking stage action, is around in plenty. Some day, as Robert Edmond Jones suggested in 1941, a director will use film to display the unconscious background to what will be played out, normal style, on stage.

¶Stan Vanderbeek, now on a junket to a Berlin cine-seminar with Amos Vogel, Shirley Clarke, Brakhage and Carmen D'Avino, is still working on his movie-drome or planetarium theatre in which he will present a multiple-projection image-bath. At the festival, Vanderbeek had people carrying portable 8 mm movie boxes, flipping the image wherever they wanted.

¶ Aldo Tambellini projected fantastic slides onto a balloon which was slowly inflated, bobbing and tossing the image around, until, at about 6 feet in diameter, it burst.

¶ USCO (see The Nation, July 5) used several slide and film projectors, strobe light, diffraction hexes in a psychedelic/McLuhan manner to achieve an image-deluge, an enormous number of images to look at all at once.

¶ Andy Warhol, who showed a single-screen film, made this statement: "Everyone is being so creative for this festival that I thought I would just show a bad movie. The camera work is so bad, the lighting is awful, the technical work is terrible—but the people are fantastic." The cast included: Baby Jane Holzer, Mario Montez, Mar-Mar, Jack Smith (who had a presentation of his own that I didn't see), Donyle and Gerard Malanga.

¶ Robert Rauschenberg offered a happening which included a film-mimics-live-dancer piece and a marvelous piece of electronic music—two men walked around with their feet in old tires smashing against and upon a bed spring wired for sound. Very Cagey.

¶Robert Whitman covered a girl clad in white with a same-size film image, against a background screen covered with another image. The film-image girl matched the real girl perfectly, so the reality was blended and multiplied. When the film image was that of a nude girl, it was hard to believe your eyes. This piece and Snyder's were the best of the festival.

Just as the festival was ending, who should appear but Murray the K and Michael Myerberg, the producer. Looking for ideas! It seems that Michael Myerberg presents Murray the K's New World will open sometime this spring at Roosevelt Field. And this total-theatre-discotheque will have top talent plus at least nineteen screens for film and slides and closed circuit, and several other media. Murray the K counts five altogether.

So this is what's happening—the expanded cinema. Even the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts library has a multi-screen film wall. Even N.B.C. has tried split-screen video for the Gemini launch/football game. And just wait until Montreal's Expo '67. Francis Thompson of the Johnson's Wax film, Disney, the National Film Board of Canada etc., are busy preparing cinema dreams.

Single-screen movies are well and good, but the art form of the age is something else. Too much is happening; we have too great a data-processing capability, for the single image to monopolize our eye. We need something bigger, more complex, more satisfying to the total sensorium. And whatever stimulation the Expanded Cinema Festival may have given the Underground, it also pointed the way to the spectacle of the future.
